It will be opposed on various grounds. By some it will be urged that we are depriving the Government of large revenues, to be derived from the sales of public lands. Let us examine this.

I find by the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the estimated expenses of that bureau for the current year will be as follows:

For salaries of Commissioner, clerks, recorders, &c.....	$236,600
For maps, diagrams, stationery, &c.....	10,000
For salaries of land officers, &c.....	232,200
For compensation of Surveyor General and clerks.....	88,108
For surveys of public lands.....	209,000
Total.....	$775,908

Now, if we suppose the cash receipts of all kinds from the sale of public lands to reach during the current year the same amount they attained during the year ending June 30, 1866, namely, $824,645 08, and if we deduct from this aggregate the estimated expenses, as set forth above, we will find that the sales of the public lands during the current year will net the Government just $48,737! A mere pittance compared with the great interests at stake. It is apparent that the question of revenue from the sale of the lands need not therefore enter into the consideration of this case.

Let us turn to another aspect of the matter. If the sale of the public land yields so little direct revenue, what is the amount of the indirect revenue derived by taxation from the prosperity and wealth of the people? Let a few facts speak.

As long ago as 1832 Mr. King, of Alabama, summed up the experience of the Government upon this point as follows:

"The history of the public lands of the United States furnishes the most instructive lessons of the utility of sales, the value of cultivation, and the fallacy of large calculations. These lands were expected, at the time they were acquired by the United States, to pay off the public debt immediately, to support the Government, and to furnish large surpluses for distribution. Calculations for a fund of $1,000,000,000 were made upon them. Yet, after an experience of nearly fifty years, it is found that the sales of the public lands, so far from paying the public debt, have barely defrayed the expenses of managing the lands, while the revenue derived from cultivation has paid both principal and interest of the debts of two wars, and supported the Federal Government in a style of expenditure infinitely beyond the conceptions of those who established it. The gross proceeds of the sales are but $38,000,000, from which the large expenses of the system are to be deducted; while the clear receipts from the customs, after paying all expenses of collection, amount to $36,443,830. This immense amount of revenues springs from the use of soil reduced to private property. The duties are derived from imported goods; the goods are received in exchange for exports, the productions of the farm and the forest."

Now, from that time to the present, the amount of receipts from the sales of public land over and above the cost of the system has been steadily decreasing, with the growth of our homestead and preemption laws, until it reaches in the current year less than $50,000. Now, if we will suppose that in the past thirty-six years the entire receipts from the sales of public lands have reached an aggregate as great as that of the fifty years before 1832, we will have the sum of $76,000,000—the grand total which the United States Government has derived from the sale of all its lands since its foundation. From this is to be deducted the cost of the lands, as follows:

For the purchase of Louisiana Territory.....	$14,984,872 28
Interest on $11,250,000.....	8,529,358 43
For the purchase of Florida.....	4,985,599 82
Interest to September 30, 1832.....	1,489,768 66
Payment of compact with Georgia.....	1,065,484 06
Payment of settlement with Yazoo claimants.....	1,830,808 04
	$32,885,891 29

From this is also to be deducted the many millions paid to the Indians in extinguishment of their titles, which amounted thirty years ago to about fifteen millions; and the many other millions paid to surveyors, land officers, and the horde of other officers who have been employed to prepare the lands for sale or to sell them.

I doubt if the entire sale of lands has yet paid one half the original cost of the same and the expenses of managing them. So far from being a source of revenue the Government has most assuredly not yet received back the money expended upon them.

Contrast this result with that revenue which is derived from the prosperity of the country, and is the measure of its productions.

In 1866 the total amount derived from internal revenue in the United States was $310,000,000; from customs, $132,000,000, making a grand total of $442,000,000.

Thus the revenue derived from the productions of the lands in the hands of industrious cultivators was, in one year, $366,000,000 more than the total amount derived from the sale of all our public lands since the foundation of the Government!

Take my own State—Minnesota. In 1866 the total amount received by the General Government from the sale of public lands in that State was but $54,837 26, while the amount paid by the citizens of Minnesota as internal revenue was, in the same year, $366,889 45.

But it is not necessary to pursue this subject further. Humanity and justice, as well as policy and statesmanship, all insist that we should sell the arable public lands of the nation to those who will live upon and cultivate them, and to those alone. In this way we shall advance the welfare of our citizens, add to the wealth of the country, open opportunities for the poor but enterprising, and build deep and wide the foundations of our prosperity upon the hearts of a happy and grateful people.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire to present three amendments to the bill, which I propose to offer at the proper time. I ask that they be read for information.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Add at the end of section one:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prohibit the sale of such lands as may be unsuitable for homestead occupancy, by being incapable of cultivation, to be determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Second amendment:

Add a new section, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where any tract or tracts of land have thereon valuable deposits of gold, silver, quicksilver, or other minerals, and by reason thereof, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it may be expedient to sell such lands at public sale, he shall be authorized to reserve such lands from sale under the laws now authorizing the sale of mineral lands, and cause them to be sold at such times, by public auction, as he may deem advisable.

Third amendment:

Add as section four:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every tract of land capable of cultivation which may hereafter be granted to railway or other companies, or to any State to aid in the construction of railways or other works, whether under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, shall be sold by such grantees only to actual settlers in quantities not greater than one quarter section to any one person, and at a price not exceeding two dollars per acre; and the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect; and no person shall be deemed an actual settler who does not furnish evidence in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, that it is his or her intention to enter upon, improve, and reside upon the lands he or she may purchase as for a homestead. And every tract of land of eighty acres shall be deemed capable of cultivation which has thereon ten acres suitable for cultivation or grazing.

Mr. HOPKINS obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. JULIAN, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CHURCHILL: The petition of Smith & Post and other firms and individuals of Oswego and of Utica, New York, importers and dealers in lumber, asking that the duty on imported lumber be changed from ad valorem to specific.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of citizens of Youngstown, Ohio, for an increase of duties on imports.

By Mr. HALSEY: The petition of Henry M. Pritchard, of Charlotte, North Carolina, asking Congress to remove his disability, so that he may vote and hold office.

By Mr. HUMPHREY: The remonstrance of Lieutenant Colonel John Nicholson and many others, officers of the volunteer service in the late war, now residing in Buffalo, New York, against the passage of a bill introduced into Congress by Senator WILSON, of Massachusetts, prohibiting the payment of claims of the volunteer officers for additional compensation now allowed them by law.

By Mr. MERCUR: The memorial of George Chorpenning, in regard to his claim under act for his relief approved March 8, 1857.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Anne E. Wing, mother of Charles A. Wing, deceased, late of company F, fifteenth New York volunteers, for arrears of pension.

By Mr. ROBINSON: The petition and papers of J. G. Belden, for use and loss of steamer Bayou by United States Navy.

By Mr. SPALDING: The petition of H. P. Sanford and others, citizens of Lake county, Ohio, for an increased tariff upon imports.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of Almira H. Thompson, for compensation as nurse during the war and money expended.

By Mr. VAN HORN, of New York: The petition of citizens of Lockport, New York, asking a pension to the widowed mother of the late Colonel Donnelly, of the twenty-eighth New York volunteers.

Also, the petition of William Reynolds, asking to be reimbursed for expenses incurred in defending himself against unlawful arrest and prosecution as a deserter.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 8, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to offer a resolution for the correction of the Journal.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Journal of the House be, and hereby is, amended by striking therefrom all record of a resolution offered by Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, on the 7th of May instant, beginning "Resolved, That the resolution adopted by this House on the 28th day of February, 1863," said resolution being and intended to be a censure on the action of this House and not fit to be entered on the Journal thereof.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] was not entered on the Journal, according to the rule, which is to be found on page 100 of the Digest, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"All motions, however, to be entered on the Journal must be first entertained by the Speaker."

The SPEAKER. The Chair declined to entertain the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] on the ground that it was not, as the gentleman alleged, a question of privilege. It could not, therefore, be entered on the Journal, and is not incorporated in the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I withdraw the resolution.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he modify his motion so that there may be a session to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. WOODWARD. No; I cannot do that. My reason for making the motion is that I feel the want of to-morrow, and I presume every member who is upon a committee feels the want of to-morrow to prepare committee business. Our attention has been so much occupied by the proceedings in the Senate that there has not been time to prepare committee business, and I think one day just now would be exceedingly acceptable to members for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. So far as I am individually concerned I would be glad to concur in the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD.] But there are many gentlemen here who have speeches which they desire to deliver. It does not require any of us to come here to hear them, but we can attend to our business just as well.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to adjourn till Monday at ten o'clock a. m., will require unanimous consent, as the hour of meeting is fixed by the rule of the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. I think it desirable for the House to meet before or at the time the Senate meet.

The SPEAKER. The Senate meet in secret session at ten o'clock.

Mr. WOODWARD. The order of the Senate fixing the hour of meeting on Monday does not provide for a secret session. The record in the Globe is as follows:

"On motion of Mr. YATES, it was "Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn it be to Monday next at ten o'clock a. m."

The SPEAKER. The Chief Justice, presiding in the Senate, has decided that, unless otherwise ordered, the Senate sitting for the trial must meet with the doors closed; and therefore the House could not be at the bar of the Senate at ten o'clock a. m. The House must meet at twelve o'clock m., unless otherwise ordered by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOODWARD. Very well; I will modify my motion so that when the House adjourns to-day it shall be until Monday next at twelve o'clock m.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. WOODWARD, as modified; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WOODWARD and Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 71, noes 27.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONNECTICUT AVENUE AND PARK RAILWAY.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. To-day being private bill day, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee for the District of Columbia, who are entitled to another morning hour. At the expiration of the last morning hour, on the 27th of March last, the House was engaged in the consideration of the following bill, reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia, namely, House bill No. 420, to incorporate the Connecticut Avenue and Park Railroad Company in the District of Columbia. The bill had been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; but not then being engrossed, it was passed over. The bill being engrossed, it will now be read the third time.

The bill was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This bill now provides that this company shall sell tickets at their offices at the rate of seventeen for a dollar. I ask consent to move an amendment, so as to require the company to sell tickets on their cars and at their offices at the rate of ten for fifty cents and twenty for one dollar.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I have no objection to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent, the bill having been read the third time.

No objection being made, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I now call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN HORN] allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I will hear it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. If I have heard the bill correctly, it does not contain any provision reserving to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act. I do not know that such a provision is absolutely necessary; but I believe it is usual to have such a provision in these bills.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I think there is such a clause in this bill. If not, I will consent to such a provision being inserted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the sixth section of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. There is one thing further I desire to suggest to the committee. The bill ought to contain some provision requiring this company to make report of their receipts and expenditures.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that we have required nothing of that kind from any of the roads heretofore chartered. If any such provision is to be adopted, it should be in the form of a general law, applicable to all the companies alike.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York will find that not only by the original act incorporating the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, but by an amendatory act, that company is obliged to make returns very full in details of all its operations. I do not know whether the company complies with the requirement; but such is the provision of the existing law.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Has the company complied with that requirement?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know. If it has not done so its charter ought to be taken away.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I will say that the company we now propose to charter has no objection to such a requirement as that proposed; and of course the committee do not object.

Mr. PRICE. Is the amendment in order without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PRICE. Then I object to the amendment.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I have already said that the committee have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. I can, in a few minutes, if the House will listen, give the reasons why this amendment ought not to go into the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is open to debate.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing further about this bill than the reading of it discloses to the House. But it will be observed that the bill provides that the company shall build their road from and to certain points, that they shall build their cars of a certain size, that they shall run at certain intervals of time, that they shall not charge more than a certain fare; and after we have prescribed every minutiae of regulation, it is proposed that the company shall be required to make a report of their doings to Congress. Such a requirement, after what is already provided in the bill, seems to me simply surplusage. As the company appear to have nobody here to take care of their interests, I propose to save them from at least this requirement, which can be of no possible use to the country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is proposed that this company shall be authorized to build a horse railroad in this District, which is exclusively under the control of Congress, and in which all the people of the country are interested. Why should the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] object to requiring the company to make report of their earnings and expenses? It is no hardship upon the company. Such a provision has been inserted, I believe, in every railroad charter heretofore granted in this District. If the gentleman would allow me a few moments, I think I could refer him to the original law and the amendatory act in relation to the railroads already incorporated.

Mr. PRICE. I think I understand this question thoroughly, and I must insist on the objection.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will send to the Clerk's desk a provision which I think will cover the point.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Iowa objects, no amendment is in order, except by reconsidering the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move that the bill be recommitted, with instructions to the committee to report it back with a provision requiring the company to make reports of their earnings and expenditures.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I desire to say that the committee has no objection to inserting in the bill the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio; but to recommit the bill will cause delay. I will promise the House that this clause shall be inserted as an amendment in the Senate. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion to recommit.

Mr. PRICE. If the committee are disposed to have this amendment adopted I certainly shall not object. The reason of my objection was that there seemed to be no discretion left to this company as to building their road, constructing and running their cars, regulating their fares, or in any other material respect. Still, if the committee do not object to the amendment, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The amendment which I propose is to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That all the provisions of the act incorporating the Washington and Georgetown railroad requiring reports of expenditures and earnings and otherwise shall be applicable to the company herein incorporated, which shall make reports as in said act required.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this amendment will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

The bill, as amended, was passed.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MERCUR asked and obtained leave of absence for next week.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill

No. 65, for the relief of William McGarrahan, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read in extenso. The first section provides that the tract of land known as the Panoche Grandé Rancho, in the State of California, granted by Governor Manuel Michelorena to Vicente P. Gomez in the year 1844, and by said Gomez conveyed to William McGarrahan on the 22d day of December, 1857, surveyed by the United States surveyor general for the State of California, and approved by him on the 11th of September, in the year 1862, and which said survey is now on file in the General Land Office, shall be in all respects hereby fully confirmed to said William McGarrahan, upon this condition, however, that the said McGarrahan shall, within twelve months after the passage of this act, pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $1 25 per acre for the lands embraced within the said survey.

The second section provides that upon the payment of the said sum of money to the Treasurer of the United States by said McGarrahan, the said Treasurer shall give a certificate therefor, and upon the presentation thereof to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a patent shall be issued to said William McGarrahan for said lands.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now ask that the report of the committee be read. It will fully explain the matter.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. HIGBY. I move that the further reading of the report be dispensed with; and I should like to ask some questions of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in reference to the material points in this case. I do not believe that the members of the House will understand much about it by the reading of the report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the reading of the report been finished?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. HIGBY. If any member wishes to hear the report read I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. It is with the chairman to say whether the report shall be read or not. It cannot be read as a matter of right.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Gentlemen wish to hear it, and I ask that the reading shall continue.

The reading of the report was then continued, but before it was concluded the morning hour expired.

The SPEAKER. The further reading of the report will be dispensed with and it will be published in the Globe.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to make a request of the House, and it is this: that this matter be continued and disposed of now, as I am anxious to leave the city after the conclusion of the impeachment for a few days. I would regard it as a great favor if the House would permit me by unanimous consent to go on with this report to-day. The report is nearly finished.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor on a privileged question.

Mr. SPALDING. And I desire to go into committee to consider two short appropriation bills.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make the request.

Mr. STEWART. I object.

The report was then ordered to be printed, and also printed in the Globe; and it then went over to the next morning hour on private bill day.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of William McGarrahan, respectfully submit the following report:

The history of this case is composed of such a multitude of circumstances, spread over a period extending from the year 1844 to the present time, that to give it in detail would be to present a report so voluminous as to defeat the very object contemplated by the House in submitting it to the committee, that of information to its members.

It has, therefore, been deemed advisable to exhibit leading and controlling facts rather than minute and unimportant particulars. The effort has been to give the present paper a synoptical rather than argumentative character, as it is believed a plain but abbreviated narrative will be sufficient to satisfy all inquirers that the bill herewith reported should pass.

An impartial statement of the facts and of prominent proceedings is, in the judgment of the committee, all that is needed to show that Mr. McGarrahan is entitled to the relief he seeks and to the land in question, as described in his original memorial presented to the House during the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

In the year 1844 Manuel Michelorena, the then Governor of Upper California, in accordance with a Mexican custom to confer lands upon deserving officials and citizens, granted to Vicente P. Gomez a tract of land, then, it would seem, considered almost valueless, and situate in the present counties of Fresno and Monterey, State of California. The property was then and is now known as "Panoche Grandé Rancho."

The making of this grant has been denied, and this denial constitutes the principal ground from which has sprung the prolonged and exhausting litigation in the case, extending over a period of more than thirteen years.

The proof of the existence of the grant is satisfactory. It is found mainly in the following facts:

I. The deposition of José Castro, who filled the office of political chief of California, and was also prefect and commandant general, which states that Gomez, with whom he was well acquainted, desired him (Castro) to inform him (Gomez) of a suitable place to petition for or secure, and that he recommended the Panoche Grandé.

II. The petition of Gomez to Governor Michelorena, March 13, 1844, requesting a grant of the rancho.

III. A marginal entry made by the Governor, March 14, 1844, on the petition of Gomez, that the proper secretary should cause the necessary investigations to be made and make report.

IV. A declaration of the same date, by Manuel Jimino, the secretary, that the petition of Gomez had been transmitted to the first justice of San Juan, in order that he should report what would be just in the matter.

V. The report of the justice, dated March 20, 1844, stating that the land was vacant, and that there was no reason why the same should not be granted.

VI. A map of the land, filed in pursuance of the justice's report.

VII. The affidavit of Valentine Gajola, employed in the Presidential Company of Monterey in 1848, showing that Gomez applied to him to make a map of the rancho, exhibited to him the title papers duly executed, and that he made the map as desired.

VIII. The deposition of José Abrigo, the head of the commissary department, and resident in Monterey, proving that Gomez was a clerk in his office, and that in 1845 he (Gomez) showed him a title to the land named, together with a map of the property; that the papers were signed by the Governor and secretary, and that he was well acquainted with the signatures of these officers, having often seen them write. That the archives in which their papers were passed into the possession of the American Army, July 7, 1846.

IX. The testimony of Abrigo, Dr. James L. Ord, a surgeon in the United States Army, and others, proving the destruction of the archives in Monterey, and the fact that such destruction is generally admitted.

X. The deposition of Oscar De Grandé Basque, stating that Gomez in 1845 showed him title papers for the rancho, and proposed a sale of the land to him.

XI. The affidavit of J. Marno Bonilla, secretary of the Superior Tribunal of Justice in Monterey, stating that Gomez in 1844 applied to him for stamped paper, to be used in procuring a title to lands; and that in 1845 he saw memoranda of grants of land, among which was that of Panoche Grandé to Gomez.

XII. The affidavit of Matias Moreno, secretary of State of Upper California, stating that in 1846 he knew Gomez had obtained a grant for Panoche Grandé, and that he saw the grant.

XIII. The affidavits of Marcio Gonzales, José Fernandez, Gabriel de la Torre, Joaquín S. Escamilla, and others, tending to prove the existence of the grant.

XIV. Statement of E. L. Gould, esq., before the Judiciary Committee, that he believed the petition of Gomez was a genuine document, and that he based his opinion on his knowledge of the facts and circumstances connected with the case of said Gomez against the United States, which involved the validity of the grant upon which this case is based. Mr. Gould was of counsel in said case in opposition to the grant, and appeared as a witness before the committee on behalf of the opposing parties.

XV. The grant by Governor Michelorena, in the year 1844, to Don Julian Ursua of the tract known as the Rancho "La Panoche de San Juan and Los Carrisaltos," wherein the tract is described as being bounded on the south by the mine of "Los Aguilas" and "La Panoche Grandé."

XVI. Statement of Henry D. Cooke, esq., that when he was in California, in the years 1847-48-49, it was common report that Gomez had received a grant of a rancho near San Juan from the Mexican Government.

XVII. In 1845 the Board of Land Commissioners, at the hearing on the evidence, as required by the laws of the United States, decided that Gomez had given satisfactory proof of the existence and loss of the grant.

1. In the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, entered into between the United States and Mexico February 2, 1848, it was provided that property of every kind belonging to Mexicans should be inviolably respected, and that the United States should pass such laws as would give effect to the different stipulations of the treaty, and always thereafter regularly enforce them. This feature was introduced to secure all landed and other interests that might in any way be affected by a change of jurisdiction over the territory embraced in the treaty. (Statutes-at-Large, vol. 9, pp. 229-231.)

2. The law contemplated was passed March 3, 1851, (United States Statutes-at-Large, vol. 9, p. 631,) creating a Board of Land Commissioners, and declaring, among other things, "that each and every person claiming lands in California by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government shall present the same to the said commissioners when sitting as a board, together with such documentary evidence and testimony of witnesses as the said claimant relies upon in support of such claims; and it shall be the duty of the commissioners, when the case is ready for hearing, to proceed promptly to examine the same upon such evidence and upon the evidence produced in behalf of the United States, and to decide upon the validity of the said claim, and within thirty days after the said decision is rendered to certify the same, with the reasons on which it is founded, to the District Attorney of the United States in and for the district in which such decision shall be rendered." (Sec. 3.)

3. February 9, 1853, Gomez, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1851, presented his petition to the Board of Land Commissioners, praying a confirmation of his claim to the Rancho Panoche Grandé.

4. The board having fully heard the evidence of the grant, decided that the claimant had given satisfactory proof of the existence and loss of the grant, but had failed entirely to offer any proof whatever going to show that he ever occupied, improved, or cultivated any part of the land, or that any one ever did for him, or that he ever saw the land; and on the ground of non-occupancy decided the grant invalid.

5. In the case of Frémont vs. the United States, (17 Howard, 542,) decided at December term, 1854, the Supreme Court of the United States held that in the case of Mexican land grants omission to take possession of the land did not of itself forfeit the right or grant. Had this determination preceded the action of the Board of Land Commissioners the grant to Gomez would certainly have been pronounced valid, as the board decided against the grant on the ground that the grantee had not entered upon and possessed himself of the land granted.

6. The decision of the Board of Land Commissioners made an appeal necessary, which was accordingly taken by Gomez, and June 5, 1857, the district court for the southern district of California confirmed his claim, and a decree to that effect was pronounced. But through what is claimed to have been a clerical mistake, and which the party asserts was unobserved for some months, the decree was for three leagues of land instead of four, as claimed, and as proved by the deposition of José Abrigo, used before the Board of Land Commissioners, and in the court, to have been comprised in the grant, and was unsigned by the judge.

7. Thus, as Gomez, his counsel, and all interested might well have supposed, the question of title was settled, subject, of course, to the right of appeal. The records of the district court presenting Gomez as owner of the rancho in accordance with the finding of the Board of Land Commissioners, the decision of the said district court, and the decision of the highest court in the Frémont case, Mr. McGarrahan, December 22, 1857, bought the property from Gomez in good faith, and for a valuable consideration.

8. The alleged error in the quantity of land stated in the decree of June 5, 1857, being discovered, an application was made to the court to correct it; whereupon, February 8, 1858, an amended decree was entered nunc pro tunc, (that is as of June 5, 1857,) covering the four leagues, and duly signed.

9. About the time Mr. McGarrahan purchased from Gomez, some persons having prospected the land discovered mineral deposits, (a fact unknown to Mr. McGarrahan when he purchased,) and finding it had been sold by Gomez they, as "squatters," took possession of and held it, as they still hold it, either in person or by assignees, cognizant of the facts, and without title.

10. March 15, 1858, the United States appealed from the decree of the district court, as it seems was their practice to do in all cases adjudicated against them, and on July 8, 1858, thirteen months after the final decree of confirmation, a motion was made by special counsel of the United States in the case, as it seems, without notice to the claimant, to have the decree opened.

11. Mr. McGarrahan having been advised that the appeal to the Supreme Court had been taken by the Government, without examination as to its merits, in accordance with the uniform practice, made application through counsel to Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, the then Attorney General, (a certified transcript of the case being presented to him,) to have him examine the case and determine whether he would persist in the appeal.

12. After full argument before the Attorney General, that officer directed that the appeal should be docketed and dismissed; and on January 31, 1859, it was so entered upon the books of his office and upon the records of the Supreme Court. Whereupon, in March, 1859, the Supreme Court issued its mandate, which ordered and decreed the docketing and dismissal of the appeal entered in the Supreme Court, and commanded that "such proceedings be had in said case as, according to right and justice and the laws of the United States, ought to be had."

13. The said mandate was filed in the district court

May 4, 1859, whereupon the court ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said mandate should be carried into effect, and that the said Gomez proceed under the decree of the court as under a final decree.

The effect of this was to perfect the title to said rancho in Mr. McGarrahan, as the grantee of Mr. Gomez.

At this stage of the case the most vigilant lawyer, consulted by client and required to examine records, could have given no other opinion upon the state of the records than that a fee-simple interest in the rancho was vested in Mr. McGarrahan.

From this time the parties occupying the property, without title or rightful claim, resorted to divers expedients to defeat McGarrahan's title: accordingly the "squatters" interest, so called, which vested in the New Idria Mining Company, appealed to controlling officers of the Government. This is shown by the following facts:

1. A consultation between Mr. E. L. Gould, counsel for the "squatters" upon the property alluded to, with the Attorney General, and immediately thereafter that officer making a motion in the Supreme Court to recall the mandate before spoken of, on the ground of fraud and want of jurisdiction.

2. The alleged fraud was declared to consist in the fact that a conveyance of an undivided half interest in the property had been made by Gomez to Pacificus Ord, then representing the United States as district attorney, and that he had consented to the propriety of the original decree of June 5, 1857.

3. It is shown that Mr. Ord, after his appointment to the office he held, not only revealed to the Government the fact that he was interested in the claim, but requested the Government to employ other counsel to attend to its interests.

4. This the Government did not do; the consequences of which was, that Mr. Ord, at the time of the original decree, having no evidence militating against the validity of the grant, acquiesced in its confirmation; and so far as this committee can discover the representation then made by Mr. Ord was in accordance with facts.

5. At this point in the proceedings it appeared that some influence, unknown to the committee, had caused the file marks and indorsements on the final order of the district court, made in obedience to the mandate of the Supreme Court, to be erased from the record, as well as the filing of the mandate itself. This seems to have been done on the 18th of January, 1860, more than eight months after the order had been filed. It also appears that certain entries in the books of the Attorney General's office respecting the original appeal in this case and the action of the Government in other appeals embraced in the same order, were not known to the court or to McGarrahan's counsel in time for them to avail themselves of the benefits thereof, on the hearing of the case in the Supreme Court, on motion by the Attorney General to revoke the mandate. It will be remembered that it was upon the conclusive evidence of his order that the Supreme Court had directed the proper entry to be made upon their record, and that that mandate was issued.

6. This failure to disclose the facts to the court by the Government undoubtedly had much to do in securing the order of the Supreme Court revoking their mandate of 1859, and which order was strangely withheld until June, 1862, when it was filed by the present claimant for the purpose of again lodging jurisdiction of the case in the court below.

7. But, in the meantime, (March 21, 1861,) the district court annulled its original decree. This extraordinary action on the part of the court seems to have been taken without notice, either to the claimant or his known counsel, and in the absence of both.

8. As soon as this condition of things was ascertained, an application was made to the court to restore the decree, and upon full hearing the order, as requested, was made on the 4th August, 1862.

9. Thus matters rested until the 25th August, 1862, when the then district attorney, contrary to express stipulations, entered into between himself and the counsel for the claimant, in their absence and without notice obtained an order of appeal to the Supreme Court.

10. The impropriety of this proceeding is made apparent for the reason that, in order to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction, a citation should have been first issued, signed by the judges, served on the claimant, and formal return made, with proof of service.

11. The law is very clear upon this point; the acts of 1793 and 1803, which regulate appeals, (the appeal not having been taken in open court at the June term in 1857, when the original decree was pronounced, nor at the December term in 1857, when the decree was entered nunc pro tunc, or, in other words, within five years as directed by the statutes,) demanded a notice to the opposite party, and the proceeding was therefore clearly wrong. The court upon a full hearing reached this determination, and accordingly decided, December 4, 1862, that the appeal allowed August 25, 1862, be vacated and set aside, and that an appeal on behalf of the United States to the Supreme Court be denied.

Here, for the second time, the record evidenced a perfect title in the claimant.

It having been twice judicially determined by the action of the courts, that Mr. McGarrahan was the legal owner of the Rancho Panoche Grandé, the aggressors upon his rights resorted to a new line of action.

1. As seen after nine years of litigation, Mr. McGarrahan, the present claimant, succeeded in acquiring two distinct confirmations of his title. It was then, in accordance with the act of Congress of June, 1862, he applied to the United States surveyor general of California for a survey of the said tract of land, and which officer caused the survey to be made and approved September 11, 1862. This survey was transmitted immediately thereafter to the General Land Office, and a patent for the property was demanded. 2. Here, again, he was confronted by the New Idria Mining Company, before referred to. The Secretary of the Interior at that time, (Hon. Caleb B. Smith,) after argument in the case, ordered the patent to issue.

Thus, again, for the third time, the title to the Panoche Grandé was found to be in Mr. McGarrahan. Some unknown cause delayed the execution of this order, and the patent was not issued. This neglect, or refusal, was persisted in throughout the remainder of Mr. Secretary Smith's term. The matter was then brought to the notice of Mr. Usher, the new Secretary, before whom it was again argued, and by whom a patent was directed to be issued. Neither the order of Mr. Smith nor Mr. Usher was obeyed, for some reason not yet divulged or ascertained.

For the fourth time the title of Gomez and his grantee was decided to be good and available in law. A request was then made by the claimant of President Lincoln that he would make an examination of the case and determine it upon its merits. This he consented to do. Printed briefs were laid before him, and upon full consideration of all the facts and circumstances he directed the Secretary of the Interior to cause a patent to issue to Mr. McGarrahan. And thus, for the fifth time, Mr. McGarrahan was declared to be entitled to the property, or rancho, and that neither the United States nor any other person had lawful claim to the same.

In accordance with this order of the President of the United States to the Secretary of the Interior, a patent was actually made out, but for reasons not fully explained never delivered to him for signature.

To recapitulate.

1. The proof of a legal grant from the Mexican Government to Gomez and the transfer of title to McGarrahan are clearly and indisputably shown.

2. The district court of the United States for the southern district of California confirmed the grant.

3. The Attorney General of the United States declared the title to the lands to be in Mr. McGarrahan, and caused an entry to that effect to be made on the books of his office and in the Supreme Court.

4. Hon. Caleb B. Smith, Secretary of the Interior, after examination and consideration of the case, ordered a patent to be issued to Mr. McGarrahan.

5. Mr. Usher, the successor in office of Mr. Smith, similarly decided.

6. Mr. Lincoln, after inquiry, decided the grant to be genuine, and that a patent should be issued to Mr. McGarrahan.

From the time when the district court pronounced its decree of confirmation (June 5, 1857) and the President's action on the case, (in the fall of 1863,) it will be observed, over six years had elapsed, and, in consequence of the lapse of time, an appeal could not be had according to law, unless something should appear to avoid the limitation.

In December, 1863, a paper, purporting to be a transcript of proceedings as they appeared on the records of the district court, was prepared in the Attorney General's office in Washington, District of Columbia, forwarded to the district attorney in California, certified by him out of his district, without comparison with the record, and merely from memory, and from which transcript were omitted material parts of the record, and returned to Washington.

Upon the transcript thus made up the case was again brought before the Supreme Court, which being discovered by the claimant, a motion was made to strike off the appeal, which was refused, although it, as it seems to the committee, was out of time, and the transcript had been made up without reference to the actual records of the district court.

Notwithstanding the Supreme Court refused to strike off the appeal taken in the manner indicated, a new transcript was obtained, 1865, from the clerk of the district court, and filed at December term, 1865, eight years and a half after the decree of the district court confirming the title was first pronounced, and more than three years after the period had elapsed within which the law allowed an appeal to be taken in the case, unless some exception takes it out of the limitation. Upon this appeal the Supreme Court, in March, 1866, decided the case against the claimant, and thus matters now stand.

The committee have bestowed a great deal of time and labor upon this case, in order to arrive at its real facts and merits. The claimant and the parties resisting his claim have been heard patiently and at great length.

In presenting the conclusion at which the committee have arrived they do not wish to be understood as undertaking to review and reverse the action of the Supreme Court relative to the case. Under and by virtue of the right of petition the claimant has presented his case to Congress, and the House of Representatives directed this committee to inquire into the grounds of his complaint. This has been done. Many facts have been presented to the committee which were not placed before the court. Additional evidence has been submitted and circumstances disclosed which have induced your committee to conclude that the relief prayed for by Mr. McGarrahan ought to be extended to him; and this may very readily be done. The title to the land claimed, and which he asks that he may be allowed to purchase, is now vested in the Government of the United States, and it is merely a question whether he shall be permitted to secure that which, in the judgment of your committee, he acquired title to by virtue of the Mexican grant aforesaid, or it shall fall into the hands of a corporation known as the New Idria Mining Company, which has been resisting his claim for years and paying the expenses of the efforts of said company out of the proceeds of the mines, the title to which rests in the United States.

It is clear that McGarrahan purchased the property in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, when it was regarded as of but little value. His interests have been attacked and his title resisted, nominally, by the United States, but really by the New Idria Mining Company. The name of the United States, their officers and money, have been used to resist his claim, and all to the end that this property, valuable as it now undoubtedly is, may pass into the hands of parties who are wholly unknown to the record of the proceedings had in the courts of the United States, respecting the title to the land in question, through all its years of transit from the Board of Land Commissioners to and through the Supreme Court of the United States.

The company aforesaid placed before the committee a memorial, in which the case is stated as follows:

"The real parties who contested the grant were your memorialists, for against them only were the efforts of the owners of the 'Panoche Grandé Rancho' directed. For the New Idria mines, and for the fruits of the labor of those who have developed them, the owners of the 'Panoche Grandé' are now seeking congressional interference in their behalf. It may well be doubted whether the 'Panoche Grandé' would ever have been heard of in the district court of the United States or in Congress but for the hope of robbing your memorialists of the fruits of their years of labor and vast expenditures of money."

This extract shows that the United States have no interest as between these parties beyond that of preserving its faith as pledged in the treaty made between this Government and that of Mexico. And as to the allegation of robbery, &c., made by said company, it may be remarked that one of its stockholders, of large interest, testified before the committee that after paying all of the expenses of said company, including every outlay, a balance would be left in its treasury on account stated.

The precedents are numerous where the Congress has afforded redress in cases of an analogous character. The following are referred to:

I. The Boscol act, 12 United States Statutes, page 808.

II. The Bolsa de Jomales act, 13 United States Statutes, page 136.

III. Ex-Mission San José act, 13 United States Statutes, page 531.

IV. Laguna de Santos Calle act, 13 United States Statutes, page 372.

V. Baron de Bastrop act, 9 United States Statutes, page 597.

In addition to which we have the act of June 21, 1860, and the act of March 1, 1861.

In view of all the facts developed in the case, and believing that justice and equity demand that the relief prayed for by the claimant be extended to him, the committee recommend the passage of the bill herewith reported.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported back House bill No. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read in extenso. The preamble states that the people of Arkansas, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, have framed and adopted a constitution of State government which is republican in form, and the Legislature of said State has duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen.

The bill then declares that the State of Arkansas is entitled and admitted to representation in Congress, as one of the States of the Union upon the following fundamental condition: that the constitution of Arkansas shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at the common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] whether it is the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction to force action on this bill to-day without any opportunity of discussion?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman's discussing it. It being a bill which, I think, is above all exception, more so than any other, I would like to hear if there is any objection to it, only I trust it will be presented as briefly as possible. I do not want to discuss a single paragraph of it, but I desire it should be acted on to-day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania here is a report to the House which consists of fifty printed pages, and it is laid on our tables this morning, or rather, I believe, it is not laid on our tables generally; I was able only a moment ago to obtain a copy. The bill itself was also only handed, to me a moment ago, and I understand the gentleman's colleague on the committee [Mr. BECK] has had no opportunity to examine the evidence submitted in connection with the report. It is desirable it should be examined and discussed. We do not consider this bill so unexceptionable as the gentleman has intimated. We think it involves important principles that ought to be discussed; that the same principles are involved in this bill that were to some extent involved in the bill admitting Alabama; and we think, without having had an opportunity to examine the papers, that it is in gross violation of the Constitution, and we ought to be allowed reasonable time to discuss it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I certainly shall not object to the gentleman's having reasonable time to discuss it. The bill has been distributed, I believe, and all I can say is, if gentlemen want to speak I hope those who think there is no difficulty about it will not occupy the time, but let the doubting gentlemen occupy the time. With that understanding, as we have now some three hours before us to-day, I will move the previous question, agreeing that I will not say a word.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. This bill is just submitted, but the papers setting forth all the facts have not yet been considered. General Grant sent in a communication on Thursday last. That has not yet been laid before the House. Though advanced copies are now here, yet members have never seen it. It is a long, detailed report. The papers also which were sent to the House by the President relating to the southern elections are not yet before us. Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will fix an early day, say Monday or Tuesday next, the House will have an opportunity to understand the facts and will be able to vote advisedly. I only ask that we may have these papers before us so as to be able to act intelligently. It will only require a delay of a day or two. The printers, I understand, will have them ready to-night or to-morrow morning.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I believe the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is in error in regard to the printing; as I understand it, all the papers which the gentleman wanted to have printed have been printed and are now on the desks of members.

Mr. BECK. I desired the affidavits accompanying the report to be printed but the committee were of opinion that they were so voluminous that it would take too long to print them. Therefore I consented that they might not be printed. But I hoped to have an opportunity to examine them if not printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understood that all that the gentleman from Kentucky really thought important to be examined have been printed.

Mr. BECK. But I hoped, with those documents before us, we could have an opportunity to examine the affidavits and the exhibits referred to. On account of the delay in printing I consented that they should not be printed. I now only ask a day or two to enable us to examine the papers.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In reply to the gentleman I will say that the examination which I made of the papers leads me to the conclusion that they are numerous, voluminous, and unimportant. The affidavits are in regard to individual transactions, attempts to vote and voting alleged to be irregular. But all these papers, as I understand from the reports made to the House, were submitted by the general commanding in that district to Colonel Tourtelotte, who went to Little Rock, Arkansas, examined the whole matter, and made a report thereon, which is printed in these documents. It covers less than three pages. I believe it is a fair statement of the whole affair, which can be read from the Clerk's desk in less than fifteen minutes. I have no doubt, for the information of the House. It is represented on all hands as a fair and candid statement, and I may say that it is stated to the committee that Colonel Tourtelotte is not of the political opinions of the controlling party in the country. We are willing to accept his statement as a statement of the truth concerning the election in Arkansas.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire if there are not here fifty printed pages, deemed of sufficient importance by the committee to have them printed and laid before us, and if it is possible for any gentleman to examine these fifty printed pages so as to discuss this bill? Ought not, then, the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] which is a reasonable one, to be granted by this House or by the gentleman having charge of this bill, to fix an early day next week when this bill shall come up for discussion. I certainly shall not then insist that the gentlemen who have made up their minds, who were referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, shall discuss it; but those who desire it ought certainly to have an opportunity to read what the committee has considered of sufficient importance to have printed and laid before us, and no one can do that to-day.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In reply to that I have to say that much of this document of fifty pages is made up of official military orders relative to the election, and can furnish no instruction whatever to the House. They were printed, as I said before, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] the committee being disposed to allow the printing of whatever he thought was desirable. But the substance of the whole matter is in the report of Colonel Tourtelotte, who reviewed the transactions in Arkansas after an examination made by him under official orders and continued through many days.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let me inquire if the committee have made any report in writing?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; we have not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I ask how the House is to get information? The gentleman tells us that these fifty pages do not contain any information of any importance, and he tells us the committee have brought in no report. And yet he has come to the conclusion that the House will be sufficiently informed and sufficiently wise to act upon this great question without any information whatever.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, the committee supposed that the gentleman from Wisconsin and his friends, who have been so anxious to have these States represented during the last three years, would consent to the bill at once.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman cannot get off in that way by holding out that this is the kind of representation that we desire.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no disposition to obtrude any obstruction in the way of speedy action in the matter of admitting Arkansas and these other States to representation. I wish, however, to say that this action is important, and ought, therefore, to be deliberative.

Now, some days ago the constitution of the State of Arkansas was ordered to be printed. I have applied to the Doorkeeper for a copy, and I am informed that it is not yet printed. I wish to see this constitution; I wish to read it; I wish to know what I am doing before voting upon so important a proposition. Now that the business is brought formally before the House, gentlemen may give their attention to the subject, may examine the constitution, and may be prepared to know what they are doing.

This bill certainly involves or raises a very grave constitutional question as to whether or not this Congress, as a legislative act, can impose the fundamental condition provided for in the bill. Now, for myself, I like the fundamental condition. I am very much attached to the provision of liberty embodied in it; but with me it is a question of power in this Congress under the Constitution of the United States—a question of our power to impose such a condition upon the State.

Now, what I say is that business of this sort should not be taken up, in the absence of the printed constitution of Arkansas, without due consideration, and pressed to a vote. I really think that the best, the most harmonious, and the proper course to be taken is to allow this matter to go over until Monday. I do not wish to be understood as committing myself by anything I have now said to any final conclusion which I may reach in reference to the propriety of the bill proposed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will now say what I have to say.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that we of the committee never had before us the communication from the President of the United States which was communicated to us on Friday last, setting forth all the facts of the Arkansas election and the report of the commissioners who conducted the election. That document went directly from this House to the Government Printing Office, and the printed copies will be sent to us to-night. We have never yet seen it; we have seen only the communication from General Grant. The printed copies of the constitution of Arkansas will be ready to-night or to-morrow. And by Monday morning we will be in possession of the facts communicated by the President, being the reports of the commissioners who held the election and also the constitution itself.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. At the time the committee selected the papers which we deemed it necessary to have printed, we selected all that the gentlemen deemed important, for the others were merely formal papers and not necessary to be printed now. The only papers deemed important are now printed here, being the reports of the district commanders.

In regard to the constitution of Arkansas, I think, when it comes to be examined, when gentlemen have after a while picked out all its flaws, that everybody will see that there is not a single clause in that constitution to which any one can object, unless it be some one who is opposed to freedom.

Now, what I propose is to ask that we now proceed with the consideration of this bill; that gentlemen on the other side, if they choose to go on and discuss this bill, may find all the fault with it if they can. Then, if the House can find anything in it which deserves a further hearing, they can delay the bill if they choose to do so. There are reasons, which I do not think it proper and necessary to mention now, why this bill should be considered, passed, and sent to the Senate before next Monday.

I now ask the previous question, as that is the only way to get at this matter.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will not press the previous question; I certainly cannot support it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that he proposed to give a reasonable time to discuss this bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will do so.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the House will not take any such precipitous action upon this bill as is proposed.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will insist upon the previous question. If there is any subject which has been talked to death in this country it is the subject of reconstruction. What is wanted now is action. I think Congress and the people are tired of the talk both on this side of the House and the other. We want to act.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the gentleman expect us to vote upon this bill without knowing what the constitution of Arkansas is? I will not vote for it until I know what the constitution is. The whole pith of the matter is the constitution, and I want an opportunity to see what it is.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] suggests that it is important to have this bill acted upon and sent to the Senate before Monday. The Senate could not act upon the bill if sent to them, for they meet on Monday at ten o'clock for a certain matter, which will occupy the whole day.

Now, allow me to say that I shall vote for any bill or anything which will bring these States back without condition into the Union, because I believe that neither Jefferson Davis nor any one of his successors here or elsewhere ever could do anything to take them out of the Union. I believe they are in the Union now; and I will vote for anything that will acknowledge these States in their right position as equal States in the Union.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will yield after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire the gentleman to yield to me in order that I may speak against the propriety of insisting upon the previous question at this time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. There is no necessity for yielding to the gentleman; the House can determine that matter.

The question was taken on seconding the previous question, and upon a division there were—ayes 67, noes 43.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ELDRIDGE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELDRIDGE and BOUTWELL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 33.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, is it in order now to move that the House adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I want to say, in order that it may go to the country, that every member of this House had a copy of the constitution of Arkansas sent to him more than three weeks ago. Every member must have received a copy, or he must have missed it through the mails. I have seen copies lying around so thickly that I think some gentlemen must have thrown them away because they did not choose to keep them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution which I have been unanimously directed by the Committee on Retrenchment to report, and which it is very desirable should be acted upon by the House immediately.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There will be no objection to the resolution when gentlemen hear it.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the presentation of the resolution now.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to close the debate, and I will yield to other gentlemen a part of my time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman says he rises "to close the debate." Does he not rise to begin it also?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will give to the gentleman an opportunity to begin it, if he so desires. I will yield a part of my time to any gentleman who wishes to speak.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I yield to my colleague fifteen minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] yield to me that I may make a motion that the House adjourn?

Mr. WOODWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] cannot yield for a motion to adjourn without the consent of his colleague, [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania,] who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to make a speech at the present time; and my friend, whom I thank for his courtesy in yielding me the floor, need not give it to me for that purpose, because, sir, I am not prepared to discuss a constitution which I have never seen. I do not know whether or not I would vote for the admission of the State of Arkansas under the constitution recently framed; for I have not seen it. I now ask my colleague—and this was my object in rising—to explain how we are to guaranty to Arkansas a "republican form of government" when we are not permitted to see the fundamental law under which that State is to be organized. I have heard a great deal this session about the obligation resting upon us to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. Now, I do not mean to say that all I have heard on that subject has been wise; but I have heard so much on that topic that before a new State comes into the Union I wish to know whether it has a "republican form of government." I want to form my judgment upon this question from the constitution or the fundamental law of the State. My colleague will excuse me for saying that I will not take his opinion upon that question; I am not satisfied to take his testimony that Arkansas is a republican State. I want to see the constitution for myself.

Now, I appeal to my venerable friend that he give us time enough to inform ourselves about that constitution before he forces us to a vote. It would be extremely awkward for me to be found voting against a truly republican State. I have no disposition to do it. On the contrary, I am extremely anxious for the admission of Arkansas and all the other excluded States, and will vote for their admission with all my heart when they present themselves in a manner fitting them to be admitted. I am very sure that my very candid friend would not desire to place any of us in that position. I do not wish to be betrayed into voting against a State for the admission of which I would cheerfully vote if I could know the grounds upon which she is to come in. Therefore I maintain it is not a question for the House, but for the gentleman's own sense of fairness and honor that he will allow his colleagues to know what they are doing before they are called upon to vote. That is the appeal I make to him.

Mr. BECK. Do I understand the gentleman will yield to me?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. WELKER. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that perhaps the best occupation of our time would be to hear the constitution of Arkansas from the Clerk's desk. It is alleged by a good many gentlemen to whom this constitution was sent three weeks ago that they never had an opportunity of reading it. I suggest that a part of the gentleman's hour be taken up with the reading of the constitution of Arkansas.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman ought to know that it cannot be read in an hour.

Mr. BLAINE. How does the gentleman know that, if he never saw it?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Nearly a month ago every gentleman upon this floor was furnished by the State of Arkansas with a copy of this constitution. If they have not seen proper to read and preserve it, it is not the fault of the State of Arkansas. It has been upon our tables. I do not expect my colleague to take my opinion on these questions, because I know he is better acquainted with them than I am. I supposed he did see the constitution. Every gentleman ought to have read it. Every member ought to have informed himself of its contents. If they have not done so then I agree that a part of my hour may be taken up with the reading of the constitution of Arkansas.

Mr. BECK. What time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. BECK. I ask for a reasonable time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. How much?

Mr. BECK. Twenty minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. That is reasonable.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, while it would take more than an hour to state properly my objections to this bill, I will avail myself of the twenty minutes allowed me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to lay before the House as many of the more prominent objections to it as I can, fully convinced that I can do no more, and that it would be idle to attempt to make a speech. I desire to state now what I have endeavored to state before, that this House is not in possession of any of the facts necessary to base its action upon. The constitution of Arkansas is now in the hands of the printer, and I doubt whether a single member of this House, outside of the members of the Reconstruction Committee, ever saw it or know a single provision contained in it. The committee have made no report and furnished no data to the House outside of the bill itself; so that you are all groping in the dark.

On Wednesday last the President of the United States sent to this House the report of the commissioners who held the election in Arkansas, which, together with the accompanying papers, were at once ordered to be printed, and were sent direct to the printer by the Clerk, where they still are, and no member of this House, nor even of the Reconstruction Committee, has ever seen them, or knows a single fact therein contained. They may show such a state of fact relative to the vote on the ratification of the constitution as to satisfy this House that it was in fact rejected? Why not postpone action till they are received? The constitution and report will be returned by the printer to-night or to-morrow as I am informed.

On Tuesday last General Grant laid before the House the report of General Gillem and the accompanying documents; a part only of this was ordered to be printed by the House, and on yesterday morning, when the Reconstruction Committee met, we found that no portion of it had been sent. We selected out such portions of it as we regarded as of special importance to a proper understanding of the facts relative to the election, and by leave of the House obtained yesterday it was sent to the printer, without consideration or more than a mere cursory examination by the committee. It is just now being returned, a few of the advance copies only having been brought in, containing fifty pages of printed matter, which, of course, no member has yet been able to read, much less to consider and understand; besides all this, there are unprinted affidavits and other papers now before me, referred to in the report just printed, which I have had time only to read hurriedly, and about the facts stated in which this House knows nothing. Yet, under these circumstances, we are required to vote upon this bill to decide that this is a proper constitution and that it was ratified by the legal voters of Arkansas when we never saw the one and know nothing about the facts as to the other.

I am compelled to dissent from the majority of the committee on both the propositions embraced in the bill. First, because I regard the proposed constitution as so unjust and oppressive to the white race, and so flagrantly violative of the powers and duties conferred by the reconstruction acts of Congress, which I assume will be considered as valid and binding, that it ought to be rejected, even if a majority of the votes permitted to be cast were cast in favor of its ratification; and second, because I am entirely satisfied that at the pretended election held as it was in a manner and under circumstances that ought to condemn and annul it, a majority of the votes cast were, in fact, cast against its ratification. I will state briefly the facts and reasons on which I rely in support of these propositions. I must, of course, confine myself to a few of the more prominent and glaringly outrageous provisions of the instrument itself, which seems to have been prepared specially to harass and oppress the native white population of the State. The convention doubtless considering that the more oppressive and vindictive they made it the more likely it would be to be acceptable here. No other State in the South has, so far, presented a constitution at all approaching this in its wholesale exclusion of white men from the right of suffrage, and none of them have had the audacity, the shameless audacity, to admit, as this does on the face of the paper itself, that all these exclusions and all this political ostracism is simply to force the white men of Arkansas to unite themselves with the Radical party, put its satellites in power and place, and like whipped spaniels on their bended knees lick the hand that scourged them. Let me here read article eight; title, Franchise:

ARTICLE VIII.

Franchise.

SECTION 1. In all elections by the people the electors shall vote by ballot.

SEC. 2. Every male person born in the United States, and every male person who has been naturalized or has legally declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, who is twenty-one years old or upward, and who shall have resided in the State six months next preceding the election, and who at the time is an actual resident of the county in which he offers to vote, except as hereinafter provided, shall be deemed an elector: Provided, No soldier or sailor or marine in the military or naval service of the United States shall acquire a residence by reason of being stationed on duty in this State.

SEC. 3. The following classes shall not be permitted to register or hold office, namely: first, those who during the rebellion took the oath of allegiance or gave bonds for loyalty and good behavior to the United States Government, and afterward gave aid, comfort, or countenance to those engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, either by becoming a soldier in the rebel army, or by entering the line of said army, or adhering in any way to the cause of rebellion, or by accompanying any armed force belonging to the rebel army; or by furnishing supplies of any kind to the same. Second, Those who are disqualified as electors or from holding office in the State or States from which they came. Third, Those persons who during the late rebellion violated the rules of civilized warfare. Fourth, Those who may be disqualified by the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen, and those who have been disqualified from registering to vote for delegates to the convention to frame a constitution for the State of Arkansas, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplemental thereto. Fifth, Those who shall have been convicted of treason, embezzlement of public funds, malfeasance in office, crimes punishable by law with imprisonment in the penitentiary, or bribery. Sixth, Those who are idiots or insane: Provided, That all persons included in the first, second, third, and fourth subdivisions of this section, who have openly advocated or who have voted for the reconstruction proposed by Congress, and accept the equality of all men before the law, shall be deemed qualified electors under this constitution.

SEC. 4. The General Assembly shall have the power, by a two-thirds vote of each House, approved by the Governor, to remove the disabilities included in the first, second, third, and fourth subdivisions of section three of this article, when it appears that such person applying for relief from such disabilities has in good faith returned to his allegiance to the Government of the United States: Provided, The General Assembly shall have no power to remove the disabilities of any person embraced in the aforesaid subdivisions who, after the adoption of this constitution by the convention, persists in opposing the acts of Congress and reconstruction thereunder.

SEC. 5. All persons before registering or voting must take and subscribe the following oath: "I, ———, (do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and maintain the Constitution and laws of the United States and the constitution and laws of the State of Arkansas; that I am not excluded from registering or voting by any of the clauses in the first, second, third, or fourth subdivisions of Article VIII of the constitution of the State of Arkansas; that I will never countenance or aid in the secession of this State from the United States; that I accept the civil and political equality of all men, and agree not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men; and, furthermore, that I will not in any way injure, or countenance in others any attempt to injure, any person or persons on account of past or present support of the Government of the United States, the laws of the United States, or the principle of the political and civil equality of all men, or for affiliation with any political party: Provided, That if any person shall knowingly and falsely take any oath in this constitution prescribed, such person so offending, and being thereof duly convicted, shall be subject to the pains, penalties, and disabilities which by law are provided for the punishment of the crime of willful and corrupt perjury.

SEC. 6. Electors shall in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest and civil process during their attendance at elections and in going to and returning from the same.

SEC. 7. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to enact adequate laws giving protection against the evils arising from the use of intoxicating liquors at elections.

These provisions, excluding from registration and suffrage all men who were disqualified in the State from which they came, were used to exclude men who had moved from Tennessee and Missouri, although they had become citizens of the State of Arkansas. They were not allowed to register or vote, although they possessed all the qualifications required by the reconstruction laws, as the affidavits on file show.

Again, it makes it a fundamental principle that every man who will stand by the reconstruction acts and vote with the party in favor of ratifying this constitution and electing its supporters shall have the right to vote; but those who do not do it shall be forever disqualified, and shall never be forgiven by any act of the Legislature. It is only when they shall have united themselves with that party that they should have any rights and privileges in the State. A more disgraceful provision could not well be imagined.

Again, it requires, no matter what may be the condition of things hereafter, that the experiment of negro suffrage shall be forever fastened upon the people, with no power, even if they change their minds on that subject, to do away with it. I have heretofore expressed my opinion of this provision in the Alabama case. No man with proper self-respect can either swear or agree to such a provision. The reconstruction acts themselves permitted every man to register and vote who was not excluded from office by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and yet the exclusion under this constitution goes far beyond, and disfranchises thousands of men who had all the qualification of electors under the reconstruction acts. The only exclusion therein contained being in the proviso to the fifth section, as follows:

"That no person excluded from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be eligible to election as a member of the convention to frame a constitution for any of said rebel States, nor shall any such person vote for members of such convention."

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That until the people of said rebel States shall be by law admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States any civil governments which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States at any time to abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same; and in all elections to any office under such provisional governments all persons shall be entitled to vote, and none others who are entitled to vote under the provisions of the fifth section of this act; and no person shall be eligible to any office under any such provisional governments who would be disqualified from holding office under the provisions of the third article of said constitutional amendment."

The third article of the constitutional amendment is as follows:

"SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability."

General Gillem issued his order on the 14th of February, 1868, declaring how the election should be held and conducted, and how the registration should be corrected. It is as follows:

[General Orders No. 7.]

HEADQUARTERS FOURTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
(MISSISSIPPI AND ARKANSAS),
VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI, February 14, 1868.

I. The Arkansas constitutional convention, convened at Little Rock, Arkansas, pursuant to General Orders No. 37, series of 1867, from these headquarters, having framed a constitution and civil government in compliance with the laws of the United States known as the "reconstruction acts," and having provided for the submitting of said constitution to the registered voters at an election to be ordered by the general commanding the district, said election is, by authority of the above-stated laws, and in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, hereby ordered to be held in Arkansas, beginning the 13th day of March, 1868, and continuing until completed; at which election the registered voters may vote for or against the ratification of the constitution herein mentioned.

II. Commencing fourteen days before the election, boards of registrars will, at the county seat or most accessible place, after having given reasonable public notice of the time and place thereof, revise, for a period of five days, the registration lists, and, upon being satisfied that any person not entitled thereto has been registered, will strike the name of such person from the list, and such person shall not be allowed to vote. The board will also, during the same period, add to the registry the names of all persons who at that time possess the qualifications required by law and who have not been already registered. All changes made in the lists of registered voters will be immediately reported to these headquarters.

III. In order to secure as nearly as possible a full expression of the voice of the people, the election will be held at each precinct of every county of the State of Arkansas, and, as required by law, under the supervision of the county boards of registration. The method of conducting the election in each county will be as follows: At the meeting provided in the foregoing paragraph each board of registrars will divide the whole number of election precincts of their respective counties into three portions, as nearly equal in number as possible, and assign one of the shares thus made to each registrar, who will be responsible for the proper conduct of the election therein. Thereupon each registrar will appoint a judge and clerk of election, who, with himself, will constitute the "commissioners of election" for all the precincts of his district. Each registrar will provide himself with a ballot-box, with lock and key, and of sufficient size to contain the votes of all the registered voters in the largest precinct. Each registrar will give full and timely notice throughout his district of the day of election in each precinct, so that he, with his judge and clerk, can proceed from precinct to precinct of his district, and hold election on consecutive days, when the distance between precincts will permit, with a view to the early completion of the voting. The election will be by ballot, and will be conducted in all details, not herein prescribed, according to the customs heretofore in use in the respective States. Each ballot will have written or printed upon it, "For Constitution," or "Against Constitution." Each voter in offering his ballot must exhibit his certificate of registry, across the face of which the clerk of election will write his name in red ink, to indicate that a vote has been cast upon that certificate, at the same time the registrar will check off the voter's name on the precinct book serving as the poll-book. The polls will be opened by nine o'clock a. m. at each precinct, and will be kept continuously open until sunset, at which time the polls will be closed, the ballot-box opened, votes counted by the commissioners, and a written return thereof, under oath of the commissioners, immediately made to these headquarters in duplicate. The votes cast will then be securely inclosed and forwarded by mail to the acting assistant adjutant general at these headquarters, with a letter of transmittal setting forth the number of votes cast for and the number against a constitution, which letter will be witnessed by the deputy sheriff present in accordance with the requirements of paragraph five of this order.

IV. Judges and clerks of election will be selected by registrars preferably from among the residents of their respective districts; but if they cannot be obtained therein, competent and qualified under the law, then from among the residents of the county; and if not attainable in the county, then the State at large; they are required to take and subscribe to the oath of office prescribed by the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, which oath may be administered by the registrar. The oaths, properly subscribed, will be forwarded immediately for file in the office of the acting assistant adjutant general at these headquarters.

The pay of these officers will be six dollars per diem for each day they are actually employed on their legitimate duties, and their actual expenses of transportation within their district will be reimbursed.

V. The sheriff of each county is made responsible for the preservation of good order and the perfect freedom of the ballot at his various election precincts in his county. To this end he will appoint a deputy, who shall be duly qualified under the laws of the State, for each precinct in the county, who will be required to be present at the place of voting during the whole time the election is being held. The said deputies will promptly and fully obey every demand made upon their official services in preserving peace and good order by the commissioner of election. Sheriffs, in making their appointments, will exercise great care to select men whom they know to be in every way able to serve. Deputies appointed in accordance with the foregoing will be paid five dollars for the day's service, on accounts approved by the registrar, out of the reconstruction fund.

VI. As an additional measure for securing the purity of the election each registrar, judge, and clerk is hereby clothed with all the functions of a deputy, sheriff, or constable, and is empowered to make arrests, and authorized to perform all duties appertaining to such officers under the laws of the State during the days of election.

VII. At every precinct on the days of election all public bar-rooms, saloons, or other places at which intoxicating or malt liquors are sold at retail, will be closed. Should any infraction of this respect come to the knowledge of the commissioners of election, or the deputy sheriff in attendance, they will immediately cause the arrest of the offending party or parties, and the closing of his or their place of business. All parties so arrested will be placed under bonds of not less than $100 to appear for trial when required by proper authority, or, in case of failure to give the required bond, will be held in arrest to await the action of the general commanding.

VIII. Should violence or fraud be perpetrated at the election in any precinct, the general commanding will exercise to the fullest extent the powers vested in him for the purpose of allowing to all registered electors an opportunity to vote freely and fearlessly.

IX. No registrar, judge, or clerk will be permitted to become a candidate for office at the election for which he serves as commissioner.

X. Such further orders as may be deemed necessary by the general commanding upon the subject of elections for State or other officers, as may have been provided for by the convention, will, when the constitution, or ordinances of the convention relating to the subject, shall have been received, be issued.

By command of Brevet Major General A. C. Gillem:

JOHN TYLER,

First Lieutenant 43d Infantry,

Brevet Major U. S. A., A. A. General.

Official copy:

WILLIAM ATWOOD,

First Lieutenant 19th Infantry,

A. A. General.

The record shows that his order, as well as the reconstruction acts, was disregarded in almost every particular. He provided that no registrar, judge, or clerk should be permitted to become a candidate for office at the election at which he served as commissioner. And yet the fact was, in a large majority of the counties, the men who conducted the election were candidates for Congress, for members of the State Legislature, for county judges, for sheriffs, and other offices, and were themselves acting in direct violation of the order. They counted the votes and determined the legality of the voters who offered to vote for or against the constitution, when the very existence of the offices for which they were candidates depended altogether upon the ratification of the constitution; for if the constitution itself was not ratified their offices all fell to the ground. They struck from and added to the registration lists to suit their own purposes, not only up to the time the polls opened, but during the time the election was being held, as the proof clearly shows.

Look at the record of the vote as shown by General Gillem's report, which shows a majority of thirteen hundred and sixteen for the constitution. Take, for instance, the county of Pulaski. The majority in favor of the constitution in that county is thirty-nine hundred and twenty-two. The polls were kept open from the 13th to the 30th of March. There were eleven hundred and ninety-five more votes cast than were registered. And the proof submitted by General Gillem shows, as I think clearly, that they kept the polls open there, and in other counties where the blacks were in the majority, until they ascertained what number of votes were necessary to carry the constitution upon which their offices depended, and they allowed them to vote without certificates.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman allow me a question? I believe he has made a mistake.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, when gentlemen cut us off without debate and then ask to take part of the few minutes they graciously allow us, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has the right to yield for explanation of the pending question if he sees fit to do it. If he declines he cannot be interrupted.

Mr. BECK. If I have made a mistake in the figures I will allow a question.

Mr. PAINE. I understood the gentleman to remark that it appeared that votes were cast in Pulaski county without certificates of registration? Did he mean to state that?

Mr. BECK. I mean to say that the investigation failed to discover that a single man out of the eleven hundred and ninety-five in excess of the registered voters in Pulaski county was a legal voter anywhere.

An examination of the report of General Gillem, and of Colonel Tourtelotte, who was sent by him to examine into the alleged frauds, will show that the commissioners conducting the election in Pulaski, where, as stated, the vote was eleven hundred and ninety-five in excess of the registration, and in Jefferson, where seven hundred and thirty votes were cast by persons not registered in the county, except in very few instances, failed to swear the persons offering to vote that they had not voted elsewhere, failed to take their names or their residences, or the places where they claimed to have registered, the number of certificates, or any other facts whereby the fraud could be traced. The registrars themselves were wholly unable to give any information which even tended to show that these persons had not voted elsewhere, and the presumptions are all that they had, the votes being all received, not only in disregard, but in palpable violation of the plainest provisions of the law. There is a large mass of evidence and information accompanying the reports of General Gillem and Colonel Tourtelotte which the committee declined to have printed, partly because of the delay it would cause, and partly because a majority of the committee considered that it would not affect the result. I have these facts now before me. I have read and examined all of them, hastily, it is true, as I have had very little opportunity to do so, and it shows substantially the following state of the case in the few counties that could be reached, either in whole or in part, by the gentleman who undertook to get the evidence to base his report upon:

1. Johnson county: Russell B. Chitwood, registrar and superintendent of the election at Spadra precinct, reported the vote for the constitution there as being one hundred and nineteen for the constitution and ninety-nine against it. The fraud there was so palpable, and the precinct so small, that they determined to make that a specimen of the whole, and accordingly the affidavits of one hundred and seventy-seven gentlemen are taken, all properly signed and sworn to, showing that they each voted against the constitution in that precinct. It appears that the whole vote cast there was two hundred and eighteen, of which forty-one was for and one hundred and seventy-seven against the constitution—a majority of one hundred and thirty-six against it, instead of twenty majority in its favor, as returned. It is claimed that the majority in Johnson county was one hundred and ninety against the constitution instead of forty-two, as reported. Besides, the affidavits of the individual voters, the joint affidavits of Messrs. Connelly and Cravens, and the letter of W. W. Floyd to Hon. F. A. Terry, on file, sustain this state of fact.

2. Madison county: the affidavits of sixteen registered voters are filed, showing that they were not allowed to vote solely because they were opposed to the constitution, and other affidavits show that twenty-one citizens, having all the qualifications required by the reconstruction laws of Congress, were not allowed to register or vote because they were known to be opposed to the ratification of the constitution.

3. Izard county: it is shown by affidavits that in Union township fifty-seven registered voters were rejected, fifteen in White River township, seventeen in Conway township, and forty-two in Mill Creek township, in all one hundred and thirty-one, because they desired to vote against the ratification of the constitution. The affidavits of eight other registered voters show that they were rejected without cause other than opposition to the constitution. The report of General Gillem shows that the vote of that county was four hundred and nine against the constitution and one hundred and forty-five for it; majority against it, two hundred and sixty-four. It appears satisfactorily that men who were opposed to it in many instances were not allowed to vote, while those who favored it were permitted to vote at their homes, on the highways, and elsewhere, as well as at the voting places designated either by law or the military orders.

4. Carroll county: in this county there are a number of separate affidavits taken; the result may be thus stated. Twenty-six registered voters swear that they, though duly qualified, were not allowed to cast their votes solely because of their opposition to the constitution; seven were rejected because they had been overseers on public roads, and one because he had come from Missouri some years before, and it was alleged that he could not have voted there if he had remained, making in all thirty-four illegally disfranchised in Carroll county.

There are also affidavits here showing that in the county of Washington more than fifty men were excluded who were known to be legal voters, many of whose votes were received and then taken by the registrars, who were candidates for various offices, and torn up in their presence and thrown on the ground. Of Pulaski and Jefferson I have spoken generally before. The greatest frauds were, perhaps, committed in these counties. There are affidavits here showing that women were permitted to vote, that minors were permitted to vote, and that the polls were kept in the hands of the registrars and executive committees, and never sent to the general commanding until there had been every opportunity to manipulate them to suit the purposes of the parties, they being themselves, in many instances, candidates for office under the constitution.

These facts are shown in this record, and I have the affidavits lying before me. General Gillem himself alleges that there are charges of fraud which ought to be investigated. The officer who was sent to make an investigation makes the same allegation, and says that it was asserted by those desiring to do so that it would take six weeks to make the investigation. He had not time to make a full investigation, but he reports all the facts that I have stated. General Gillem returns a letter to him from the Democratic Central State committee, which I will read, offering to prove all the alleged frauds if time is allowed. It is as follows:

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS, April 13, 1868.

GENERAL: In your telegram of March 28, to Colonel F. A. Terry, you gave the assurance that "charges of fraud," in the late election, "preferred by either party," would be "impartially investigated."

Relying on that pledge, and with a view to afford a basis for making it effective, we, as the central committee of the Democratic party of Arkansas, do now allege that in many of the counties, if not in all, gross wrongs and frauds were perpetrated in the interest of the Radical party, making the election a mockery, and nullifying the legally expressed will of a large majority of the registered voters of the State, by whom the constitution was, in fact, overwhelmingly rejected, instead of being adopted, as its advocates falsely claim.

Among the acts fraudulent in themselves, or used to cover frauds, we specify the following:

I. That nearly all the registrars of the election were bitter Radical partisans, and were, in many counties, candidates for office, dependent for success on the ratification of the constitution—as in Pulaski, Jefferson, La Fayette, White, Little River, and others.

II. That at the revision of registration lists sundry registrars, disregarding the reconstruction laws, as well as orders from district headquarters, illegally and fraudulently erased the names of citizens entitled to vote, refused certificates to others similarly entitled, and granted certificates to persons having no right of suffrage whatever as in Yell, Carroll, Crawford, Washington, Independence, and other counties.

III. That, although the election began on March 13, it was not concluded in counties polling a heavy negro vote till after all the counties having white majorities had voted, enabling the Radicals to supply any number of votes needed to secure a fictitious majority—as in Jefferson, where the polls were not closed till March 28, and in Pulaski, where they remained open till the 30th.

IV. That large numbers of ignorant negroes were forced by threats of punishment or bribed by promises of pecuniary rewards to vote for the constitution—as in Phillips, St. Francis, Crittenden, Chicot, Desha, Jefferson, Pulaski, and elsewhere.

V. That many timid white men were deterred from voting against the constitution by savage menaces of members of the Radical party, backed by the appearance of military support; as also by the tyrannical provisions of the constitution itself, disfranchising all persons voting against it, without regard to their personal or political antecedents.

V. I. That unjust discriminations were made against white men, and in favor of negroes, by allowing the latter to vote at any precinct in the State, but restricting the former, if Democrats, to the precincts of their actual residence—as in Arkansas, White, and other counties.

VII. That among the votes counted for the constitution (and far exceeding the majority claimed for it) many were illegally and fraudulently cast, by persons voting repeatedly at different precincts, or simulating dead or absent voters, or being non-residents of the State, minors, women, or otherwise disqualified; and many others were, in reality, not cast at all, but were corruptly placed in the ballot-boxes, either in addition to the votes actually cast, or else in lieu of them, these last being perjured and destroyed; all of which was done, wholly or in part, in Johnson, White, Phillips, Jefferson, Pulaski, Cross, St. Francis, and other counties.

We beg you to believe, General, that the foregoing charges and specifications are by no means extravagant. They are the mildest possible expression of the feelings and positive knowledge of the outraged white people of Arkansas, who, bent, but not yet crushed, by such monstrous frauds and villainies, appeal, through us, to you, as of their own race and blood, to give them the opportunity to establish the truth of all that is herein alleged. This we offer to do, before an impartial commission of honorable officers, by clear testimony, and in due form of law; and, after making good this engagement, we further beg the privilege of confirming the proofs adduced by our votes, at a free and fair election, to be held throughout the State on one and the same day, by judges and clerks taken equally from both parties, and with ample notice to all the people. In that way the true sentiment of the registered voters can be ascertained; which is the professed aim of the reconstruction laws, and must be your object as a soldier and gentleman.

Allow us to add the hope that your action on this, our solemn protest against injustice and fraud, and our humble petition for a redress of grievances, will not be long delayed, especially when it is considered that the Radical party, in contempt of all precedent and law, and as proclaimed by them before the election, have already installed their pretended Legislature and usurped by force the government of the State.

We have the honor to be, General, your most obedient servants.

R. A. HOWARD,
FRANCIS A. TERRY,
R. C. NEWTON,
ARNOLD SYBERG,
L. B. NASH,
C. E. MOORE,

Committee.

Brevet Major General ALVAN C. GILLEM,
Commanding Fourth Military District.

As will be observed, these gentlemen, who are men of the highest character and intelligence, offer to prove that the constitution was defeated by an overwhelming majority. And there is not a gentleman in the House who will look into the facts sworn to who will not say that it was so defeated. And yet in the face of all these facts, and in the absence of all the information which was sent to the House by the President, and which can be obtained in a day or so, in the absence of the constitution itself, and in ignorance of the facts reported by General Gillem, it is proposed to admit the State of Arkansas to representation here, and to swear in the men who are claiming the seats upon the ground that a majority of the people have voted for the constitution, when the information in the hands of the printer and the affidavits which I have before me, only a part of which I have had time to collate, show conclusively that the facts are not as stated in the bill.

Now, sir, I have not time to discuss the provisions of the constitution itself. Upon the question of education, upon the question of taxation, upon the power given to the commissioners appointed to control the election, and upon a variety of other questions, the constitution is, perhaps, the most objectionable that you ever saw. While they resolve in the ordinance attached to the constitution as follows:

"That this convention is utterly opposed to all amalgamation between the white and colored races, whether the same is legitimate or illegitimate.

"We would therefore recommend that the next General Assembly enact such laws as may effectually prevent the same."

they require that the school fund, of perhaps $1,000,000, shall be kept for schools to which blacks and whites shall go together, and it compels a white man, if he is unable to educate his children otherwise, to send to the negro schools their sons and daughters between the ages of five and eighteen years for at least three years. The constitution requires the Legislature to pass such laws as will compel them to go. Of course it will be a penal offense if they do not go. That part of the constitution reads thus:

"The General Assembly shall require by law that every child of sufficient mental and physical ability shall attend the public schools during the period between the ages of five and eighteen years for a term equivalent to three years, unless educated by other means."

Now, sir, I think this House, even now, after the previous question is seconded, in justice to itself, in justice to the truth of history, should postpone this matter and look into it, and I assert that you will find the facts to be as I have stated them, and that there are in this constitution provisions more obnoxious than are contained in any other constitution that has been sent up from these southern States; provisions that no one can, with proper respect for himself, submit to as the fundamental law of the State in which he lives.

We want time also to look into the way in which this vote was taken. It was, as I have shown, taken in great part by registrars who were themselves candidates for office, in violation of the order of General Gillem and the reconstruction laws. It was taken by men directly interested in the result, by men who excluded from the polls hundreds and thousands of men who were as much qualified to vote as they were, that allowed men, women, and children to vote to swell up a majority in favor of the constitution. These facts, I suppose, are to be altogether ignored, because the polls have been so manipulated as to show a majority for the constitution which is oppressive enough to suit the views of the majority here. Col. Tourtelotte shows that in one of the large counties, the county of Jefferson, the president of the board of registrars, who had charge of the votes of all the precincts in the county, instead of making the return to the proper officer, took the ballots of the county to Little Rock, got drunk, and kept them for several days, and they were not forwarded till the registrar, John A. Williams, was ordered by General Smith to forward them; that is the county where these seven hundred and thirty ballots were found to have been cast by persons not registered in the county, and whose names, residences, and everything whereby they can be traced, are unknown. The polls did not close in Jefferson till the 28th of March, and during the four days Williams was drunk at the radical headquarters at Little Rock the number of votes necessary to make the majority for the constitution safe, so as to secure the offices, was doubtless ascertained and provided against in part through his ballot-boxes.

All these things appear here. We cannot now tell what else is contained in the documents communicated to the House by the President and sent to the Government Printing Office. But if this matter shall be postponed until Monday we can then ascertain what is contained in those papers. By that time these unprinted papers, now before me, can be put in shape, so that the House can understand them. I have done it in part now, and will continue the work on it, if I am allowed the time. I have not yet had time to do it, because these papers cover two hundred pages. The facts will all be made to appear as I have stated, if the examination is made; and I want the country to understand that this House is without excuse if they fail to examine and understand them. Perhaps it is the knowledge of the undeveloped facts that makes those who know them so anxious to press the bill through to-day.

I have in my hand the letter of Hon. F. A. Terry to General Gillem, which he sends here, as follows:

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS, April 22, 1868.

GENERAL GILLEM: Please find evidences of fraud from Washington, Madison, Izard, White, Carroll, Ouachita, and perhaps Woodruff counties. There is no county in the State where there has been no fraud. The election was held and returns made by registrars, pretty much all of whom were candidates for office, depending on the success of the constitution for lucrative places. We remonstrated with General Smith against letting candidates conduct the election, but instead of heeding our complaints he encouraged registrars to be candidates by altering your order in that particular.

We have advice of affidavits having been sent us from many counties through the post office, which from some cause have failed to reach us. I have made complaint before the mail agents. With time we can show frauds by nearly every registrar in the State.

Yours,

F. A. TERRY.

And there are now other papers on file here with the report of General Gillem, which I have not time even to notice. Being printed now, members can examine them. They show that tremendous frauds were committed. The General himself shows that it was the 22d day of April before he could obtain the information from Arkansas to make up the statement which he forwarded. If, with all the means under his control, it took him all that time, by special agents, telegrams, and other facilities to get the information he has, how could it be expected that private citizens could in a few days, with all the officers of the election against them, develop the frauds they knew existed. The mails even were not free to them. It is only wonderful that they were able with such limited opportunities to develop as much as they have.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I would inquire of the Chair how much time I now have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-three minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. My colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] desires twenty minutes' time. As we have time enough this afternoon to be able to give him twenty minutes without deducting it from the hour allowed to me, I hope the House will agree to give him that time, and I will apportion the hour among others.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] is entitled to the floor for twenty minutes.

Mr. PILE. I desire to say a few words, and I would suggest that the time for debate on this bill be extended thirty minutes instead of twenty minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to extending the time one single minute for the benefit of any gentleman who insisted upon the previous question unless the demand for the previous question shall be withdrawn.

Mr. WOODWARD. If the facts and circumstances which have been stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will not induce this House to pause and give us an opportunity to see the constitution of Arkansas in print before we vote upon it, then they would not be persuaded though one rose from the dead. And I have not a word more to say on that point.

But if we are to be driven into voting blindfold upon this measure, I wish to state a few historical facts on which I expect to be contradicted by no sane man in this House. It is a fact that the State of Arkansas belonged to the Federal Union under a constitution which was republican in form, and it was one of the republican States of these United States. It is a fact that she repealed that ordinance of accession by which she became one of the United States, and adopted an ordinance of secession by which she claimed to have gone out of the Union. It is a fact that the Federal authorities, legislative, executive, and judicial, have decided and held that that ordinance of secession was void and null, and consequently that Arkansas was never out of the Union. It is a fact that Arkansas herself has repealed that ordinance of secession, of which itself, ex proprio vigore, revives her political ordinance of accession if she, indeed, ever was out of the Union. And thus to-day, in point of law and in point of fact, Arkansas is within the Federal Union as truly as she ever was.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOODWARD. No, sir; I cannot afford the time. If the gentleman will agree to open debate fully for my friends around here and myself I will yield.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask pardon of the gentleman for asking him to give me back a crumb of the loaf which I gave to him.

Mr. WOODWARD. If the gentleman will take the responsibility of denying any of the facts I have stated he is at liberty to do so. I say this: if the State of Arkansas was ever out of the Union—and you decided long ago that she was not—the repeal of her ordinance of secession restores her to the Union under her old constitution which was republican in form, under which we always knew her, and under which we claimed her perpetual allegiance to the Union. Will any man stand up here to deny any of these facts? I trust not.

Then, sir, if these are undeniable facts, what are we doing to-day? We have sent an army into Arkansas; we have thrown open the ballot-box to negroes and to others who were not voters; and by the aid of Federal bayonets and test-oaths have excluded men who were voters. And now you propose to recognize a constitution, the work of those men under Federal bayonets, as the constitution of an existing State at all times within the Union, having already a constitution of her own; and this you call "reconstruction." Mr. Speaker, if that be reconstruction, there have been no revolutionary, subversive, and treasonable measures ever contemplated or perpetrated in this country which might not be called "reconstruction." If this be not the overturning of a sovereign State by Federal power and the forcing upon her of a fundamental law not of her own choosing, the boys in school in this country will need to be taught the first principles of common sense; for that is the way they will understand it; that is the way all plain men will understand it. That is according to the historical facts in the case.

Now, sir, at some time or other this whole question is to be passed upon by the courts; and when it comes under judicial review what will be found? Why, that the Congress of the United States has overrun States of the Union by the power of the Federal bayonet and forced upon them a constitution which is not of their choice. What may be the judicial conclusion from these facts I do not know, and do not undertake to predict; but that these facts will be judicially ascertained gentlemen must understand is as certain to occur as the future is to come. And how have you done it? Why, sir, when I had a discussion here the other day with my colleague [Mr. BROOMALL] about the power of Congress to force negro suffrage upon the State of Pennsylvania, I understood from several gentlemen on the Republican side of the House that they were as much opposed to that preposterous proposition as I was myself; and I presume they expressed their candid opinion. Now, I ask, if you have not the right to force negro suffrage upon the State of Pennsylvania at the point of the bayonet, on what principle can you force negro suffrage upon the State of Arkansas? These constitutions are all constructed upon the basis of negro suffrage—not suffrage voluntarily conceded by the States, a proposition which I have never combated, but for which, on the contrary, I have always contended; but they are constructed upon the basis of negro suffrage forced upon the States by the Federal bayonets of this Government. Will any gentleman deny that?

Now, then, if Arkansas has been in the Union all the time—if her act of secession was null and void, or, if being valid, it has been repealed, and thus her original accession revived by force of law—I demand by what authority you march your armies into such a State and make negroes adopt a constitution dictated here in Washington? Do you suppose the people of this country will sustain you in such conduct? Most assuredly they never will, if they understand it; and my main purpose now in stating these facts is to call public attention to the condition in which this House is placing itself, forcing upon a sovereign State a fundamental law in violation of that principle of State suffrage which we have always recognized, which was so nearly conceded the other day, when my colleague brought forward his proposition, that in the evening, when it had been discussed all day, he was glad to hide it away in the tomb, not of the Capulets, but of the Judiciary Committee; and I suppose it will never be heard of again. Even the gentleman who brought forward the proposition did not dare to take the sense of this House upon it. How was that proposition any worse or better than this? If the House is now prepared to vote in favor of forcing such a military negro constitution upon Arkansas, my colleague will probably bring forward again his bill to-morrow; for the same majority will, no doubt, be equally ready to force a negro constitution on every State in this Union.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] show overwhelmingly the propriety of delaying the vote on this question. Every consideration of public duty demands that we should have an opportunity to see the Constitution upon which we are asked to vote. If this opportunity be denied us, then I ask gentlemen to take notice that they are overrunning an existing State, subverting it by force of arms; and this is making war upon the State. Now the definition given to "treason" in most of our State constitutions is the levying of war against the State. If this be not the levying of war against the State of Arkansas I would thank the gentleman to expound the historical facts in some manner consistently with our innocence. If they admit the historical facts to which I have alluded, I say the conclusion must result as a necessary consequence that we are subverting government by force of arms, by the levying of war, and that comes up to the definition in our State constitution of treason.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-three minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Some gentlemen desire to have some reading done, and I do not object. I think I can answer my colleague very shortly. He undertakes to prove that Arkansas has never been out of the Union, and he then takes twenty minutes to prove that she cannot come in. [Laughter.] I do not understand it; and I yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE. My colleague on the Committee on Reconstruction, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] made a statement, inadvertently I presume, which I wish to correct. I understood him to say these votes in Pulaski county, which were given in excess of the registration in that county, were given by men who had no certificates. That means, of course, certificates of registration. The House will bear in mind that in our last amendment of the reconstruction acts we authorized, as we had never before authorized, men who were registered in any county of Arkansas or the other unreconstructed States, or in any precinct, might vote wherever they happened to be residents at the time of and for ten days preceding the election. It appears by the report of General Gillem, dated April 22, 1868, and from the report of Colonel Tourtelotte of the same date, and they both concur in the statement, that these men who voted in the county of Pulaski presented their certificates showing that they had been registered somewhere in the State. There is no proof that persons voted anywhere in Arkansas, either in Pulaski county or elsewhere, without a certificate of registration.

But it does certainly appear that in the county of Pulaski a large number, fourteen or fifteen hundred, voted upon certificates of registration in other counties, as they were by law entitled to vote. I frankly admit that. I will read from the reports of General Gillem and Colonel Tourtelotte on this point. I will read first from the report of Colonel Tourtelotte, who, under orders from General Gillem, investigated the alleged frauds in this election:

"The registrars of Pulaski county permitted (except in the precinct of Ashley, where the election was first held) all persons who presented certificates of registration showing that they had been registered at any precinct in the State to vote. They allowed many persons to vote where certificates showed that they were registered at other precincts and in other counties than the county and precinct where they did vote.

"Without any doubt, fourteen or fifteen hundred persons registered elsewhere voted in Pulaski. The registrars of Jefferson county pursued the same course, and allowed persons, wherever registered, to vote at any precinct where they presented themselves, taking no record of the same, and only checking such votes by marks upon the certificate of registration which was returned to the voters.

"No fraud by registrars appears to have been intended in this matter, as they allowed persons elsewhere registered to vote only after mutual consultation and consideration of act of Congress passed March 11, 1868, but their conduct was very unfortunate, as the registration law was thus virtually impaired."

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman will allow me for one minute, if he will read the next four lines he will see that they did not require them to take any oath, nor did they ascertain where they resided.

Mr. PAINE. If my friend from Kentucky wishes the residue of this section read, I am sorry that he did not read it when he himself held the floor. He now refers to certain passages relating to a different subject from that which I am now discussing. But I will come to it soon if I have time. I admit, of course, that many things not required by law to be done were not, in fact, done in that election. General Gillem says, in his report:

"Prior to the act of Congress passed March 11, 1868, and which was promulgated in General Order No. 14 from the War Department, dated March 14, 1868, there was no law or order in existence permitting voters registered in one county or precinct to vote in any other county or precinct. The act above referred to authorizes 'any person duly registered in the State to vote in the election district where he offers to vote when he has resided therein for ten days next preceding such election, upon his presentation of his certificate of registration, his affidavit, or other satisfactory evidence, under such regulations as the district commander may prescribe.'

"The order containing this law was not received until after the election, and the dispatch from the General-in-Chief containing no intimation of this provision, I was unaware of the existence of the law, and therefore prescribed no regulations for persons voting at other precincts than those in which they registered.

"It appears from the report of Colonel J. E. Tourtelotte (see Appendix C, No. 1, to which special attention is invited) that the registrars in Pulaski, Jefferson, and Washington counties, learning unofficially of this law, determined, on their own responsibility, to receive the votes of persons registered in other counties."

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that this law which we enacted was not put in force to any great extent in Arkansas, and this constitution was, as a consequence, deprived of the votes of thousands of registered colored voters. If it had been promulgated I have no doubt the majority in favor of that constitution would have been from five to ten thousand instead of thirteen hundred. These people are, within their own States and districts, a migratory people, as everybody knows, and they were not generally permitted to vote because they did not happen to reside where they were registered. But in this district where they had learned, by telegraph or other means, that this law was in force, they voted without any military authority, as, of course, they had a right to do.

Now, General Gillem further says—and he is a man by no means prejudiced in favor of this constitution or its advocates and defenders:

"As there was no separate record kept of the nineteen hundred and twenty-five votes cast in Pulaski and Jefferson counties by persons not registered in those counties, there are no means of ascertaining whether or not they were cast for or against the constitution."

The gentleman, therefore, does not know on which side of the question the votes were cast in those counties by the men who were registered elsewhere but voted there. They had a right to vote, and to vote for or against the constitution. And my friend has no more right to assert that these fifteen hundred votes were in fact cast for the constitution than I have to assert that they were cast against it. Nor has he any proof that, however cast, they were illegal votes.

General Gillem adds:

"And, therefore, if the reception of these votes by the registrars under a law, the existence of which they had no legal notification, is held not to invalidate the election in the two counties above named, the constitution appears to have been adopted by a majority of thirteen hundred and sixteen."

Thus General Gillem sums up and closes the whole case. It is his last report, and he declares that if the election in those counties is not invalidated by the mere fact that he did not officially communicate to them the information that this law had passed and become binding upon them, then the official majority for the constitution is thirteen hundred and sixteen. This covers the whole ground. This act was an act of Congress and took effect from its passage. General Gillem might in some details regulate but could not prevent its operation.

He farther states:

"Each party charges the other with frauds, those opposed to the constitution asserting that a large number of the votes cast in Pulaski, Jefferson, and Washington counties were by unauthorized persons, and in some instances that the same persons were permitted to vote several times. Those in favor of the constitution charge that force and intimidation were used to prevent legal voters from attending the polls, and that in one instance—that of Union county—armed parties were stationed on the roads for that purpose."

I have not time to read the evidence on this point. I will now refer to the report of Colonel Tourtelotte. After speaking of particular complaints, one of which was that "In Jefferson county a woman voted for constitution, presenting the certificate of registration of her husband, who was in jail," which is the only instance given to sustain the assertion of the gentleman from Kentucky that women were permitted to vote at this election, and which, for all we know, may have been one of the numerous instances in which rebels imprisoned colored men, on frivolous charges, to defraud them of their votes. Colonel Tourtelotte says:

"The remainder of the affidavits received contain matters of hearsay and secondary evidence, which if untrue could not be used as foundation for a charge of perjury, and which, true or untrue, cannot as they are taken to change the result of election. Besides these affidavits must be suspected when in some cases the original and direct testimony might have been produced. There is in Arkansas much interest in the election, and wagers to considerable amount are pending the announcement of the result. It is understood that returns show the constitution adopted, and the opponents thereof are very anxious to defeat it."

"To this end they promise that the constitution was adopted through fraud, and are now searching throughout the State for proof. Evidence thus, and for such purpose, obtained must certainly be suspected. It would have appeared much better if they had asserted fraud upon proof first obtained. Many respectable persons charge fraud and promise the proof, but admit they do not now know the facts which will be proven, and base their statements upon the fact that most of the commissioners of election were interested for the constitution, and many of them personally interested."

Now, one word as to this complaint that registrars were, in some cases, candidates for office. In his report Colonel Tourtelotte says:

"Registrars were candidates for office by virtue of permission of General Smith, commanding sub-district of Arkansas, copy of which permission is herewith respectfully transmitted."

I am informed—I cannot state it of my own knowledge, but I do state it upon information and belief—that at none of the polls where the candidates for office were voted for was any candidate a registrar. It must be remembered that there were two sets of polls or voting places. At one of these the elections were held under the reconstruction laws for the ratification or rejection of the constitution. At the other, elections were held under the constitution itself, at which the registered voters voted for or against the constitution, and also at the same time for the various civil officers provided for by the constitution. So there were two boards, and I am informed by gentlemen from that State that there was no registrar on any of the boards of the latter class who was a candidate for office.

One word further from the report of Colonel Tourtelotte:

"I further beg leave to state that I do not think the persons who have charged fraud in this said election have confidence in being able to prove it to the extent charged, and I believe said persons manifest an inclination to trifle with the military authorities."

This is from a man who, I am informed, was not a member of the Republican party, but who sympathized with our opponents. I believe we may take his report as a fair report of the result of that election.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE.]

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, quite a number of gentlemen, on each side of the House, say that they have not seen the constitution of the State of Arkansas, that they have not received it through the mail; or, if they have, it has been thrown aside, as many such pamphlets are thrown aside, and they have not examined it. As the best argument which can be made in answer to those who object to the constitution I send to the Clerk's desk that constitution and ask him to read the articles which I have marked.

Mr. SPALDING. Before that is done, I ask the gentleman if he will not advert for a moment to the proviso to the first section of the bill. We are not so much troubled about the admission of Arkansas under this constitution, but there is a proviso here that the constitution of Arkansas shall never be changed. I would like to have the gentleman expound that, for we feel a want of power in Congress to attach that proviso.

Mr. PILE. I leave that to the gentleman who has charge of the bill. I do not intend to discuss that feature of the bill, but only to answer the objection to the constitution based on the fact that gentlemen have not seen it, and do not know its provisions. I ask to have read the Bill of Rights, the article on the subject of franchise, and the article on the subject of education. These embrace the main features of the constitution, and are the provisions which have been specially attacked by those who have spoken against the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Preamble.

We, the people of Arkansas, grateful to God for our civil and religious liberty, and desiring to perpetuate its blessings and secure the same to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution:

ARTICLE I.

Bill of Rights.

SECTION 1. All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people, and they have the right to alter or reform the same whenever the public may require it. But the paramount allegiance of every citizen is due to the Federal Government in the exercise of all its constitutional powers as the same may have been or may be defined by the Supreme Court of the United States; and no power exists in the people of this or any other State of the Federal Union to dissolve their connection therewith or perform any act tending to impair, subvert, or resist the supreme authority of the United States. The Constitution of the United States confers full powers on the Federal Government to maintain and perpetuate its existence, and whenever any portion of the States, or the people thereof, attempt to secede from the Federal Union, or forcibly resist the execution of its laws, the Federal Government may, by warrant of the Constitution, employ armed force in compelling obedience to its authority.

SEC. 2. The liberty of the press shall forever remain inviolate. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of man, and all persons may freely speak, write, and publish their sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of such right. In all criminal prosecutions for libel, the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true, and was published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the party shall be acquitted.

SEC. 3. The equality of all persons before the law is recognized and shall ever remain inviolate; nor shall any ever be deprived of any right, privilege, or immunity, nor exempted from any burden or duty on account of race, color, or previous condition.

SEC. 4. The citizens have a right, in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for their common good, to instruct their representatives and to petition for the redress of grievances and other proper purposes.

SEC. 5. The citizens of this State shall have the right to keep and bear arms for their common defense.

SEC. 6. The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate and shall extend to all cases at law without regard to the amount in controversy; but a jury trial may be waived by the parties in all cases in the manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 7. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor shall excessive fines be imposed, nor shall cruel nor unusual punishments be inflicted, nor witnesses be unreasonably detained.

SEC. 8. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the county or judicial district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which county or district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel in his defense.

SEC. 9. No person shall be held to answer a criminal offense unless on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases of impeachment, or in cases of petit larceny, assault, assault and battery, affray, vagrancy, and such other minor cases as the General Assembly shall make cognizable by justices of the peace, or arising in the Army or Navy of the United States, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; and no person, after having been once acquitted by a jury, for the same offense, shall be again put in jeopardy of life or liberty; but if, in any criminal prosecution, the jury be divided in opinion, the court before which the trial shall be had may, in its discretion, discharge the jury and commit or bail the accused for trial at the same or the next term of said court; nor shall any person be compelled in any criminal case to be witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. All persons shall, before conviction, be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offenses, murder and treason, when the proof is evident or the presumption great; and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require.

SEC. 10. Every person is entitled to a certain remedy in the laws for all injuries or wrongs which he may receive in his person, property, or character; he ought to obtain justice freely, and without purchase; completely, and without denial; promptly, and without delay; conformably to the laws.

SEC. 11. Treason against the State shall only consist in levying war against the same or in adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act or on confession in open court.

SEC. 12. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized.

SEC. 13. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law, nor any law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall ever be passed; and no conviction shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate.

SEC. 14. No person shall be imprisoned for debt in this State; but this shall not prevent the General Assembly from providing for imprisonment or holding to bail persons charged with fraud in contracting said debt. A reasonable amount of property shall be exempt from seizure or sale for the payment of debts or liabilities.

SEC. 15. Private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation therefor.

SEC. 16. The military shall be subordinate to the civil power. No standing army shall be kept up in this State in time of peace; and no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 17. Suits may be brought against the State in such manner and in such courts as may be by law provided.

SEC. 18. The General Assembly shall not grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens.

SEC. 19. The right of suffrage shall be protected by laws regulating elections, and prohibiting, under adequate penalties, all undue influence from bribery, tumult, or other improper conduct.

SEC. 20. Foreigners who are or may become bona fide residents of this State shall be secured the same rights in respect to the acquisition, possession, enjoyment, and descent of property as are secured to native-born citizens.

SEC. 21. No religious test or amount of property shall ever be required as a qualification for any office of public trust under the State. No religious test or amount of property shall ever be required as a qualification of any voter at any election in this State; nor shall any person be rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity in consequence of his opinion upon the subject of religion, and the mode of administering an oath or affirmation shall be such as shall be most consistent with, and binding upon, the conscience of the person to whom such oath or affirmation may be administered.

SEC. 22. Any person who shall, after the adoption of this constitution, fight a duel or send or accept a challenge for that purpose, or be aider or abettor in fighting a duel, either within this State or elsewhere, shall thereby be deprived of the right of holding any office of honor or profit in this State, and shall be forever disqualified from voting at any election, and shall be punished otherwise in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

SEC. 23. Religion, morality, and knowledge being essential to good government, the General Assembly shall pass suitable laws to protect every religious denomination in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of public worship; and to encourage schools and the means of instruction.

SEC. 24. All lands in this State are declared to be allodial, and feudal tenures of every description, with all their incidents, are prohibited. Leases and grants of land for a longer period than twenty-one years hereafter made, in which shall be reserved any rent or service of any kind, shall be held a conveyance in fee to the lessee.

SEC. 25. The action of the convention of the State of Arkansas which assembled in the city of Little Rock on the 4th day of March, 1861, was and is null and void. All the action of the State of Arkansas under the authority of said convention, of its ordinances or its constitution, whether legislative, executive, judicial, or military, was, and is hereby, declared, null and void; and no debt or liability of the State of Arkansas incurred by the action of said convention or of the General Assembly or any department of the government under the authority of either shall ever be recognized as obligatory: Provided, That this ordinance shall not be so construed as to affect the rights of private individuals arising under contracts between the parties, or to change county boundaries or county seats, or to make invalid the acts of justices of the peace or other officers in their authority to administer oaths or take and certify the acknowledgments of deeds of conveyance or other instruments of writing or in the solemnization of marriage.

ARTICLE VIII.

Franchise.

SECTION 1. In all elections by the people the electors shall vote by ballot.

SEC. 2. Every male person born in the United States, and every male person who has been naturalized or has legally declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, who is twenty-one years old or upwards, and who shall have resided in the State six months next preceding the election, and who at the time is an actual resident of the county in which he offers to vote, except as hereinafter provided, shall be deemed an elector: Provided, No soldier or sailor or marine in the military or naval service of the United States shall acquire a residence by reason of being stationed on duty in this State.

SEC. 3. The following classes shall not be permitted to register or hold office, namely, first, those who during the rebellion took the oath of allegiance or gave bonds for loyalty and good behavior to the United States Government, and afterward gave aid, comfort, or countenance to those engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, either by becoming a soldier in the rebel army, or by entering the lines of said army, or adhering in any way to the cause of rebellion, or by accompanying any armed force belonging to the rebel army, or by furnishing supplies of any kind to the same. Second, Those who are disqualified as electors or from holding office in the State or States from which they came. Third, Those persons who during the late rebellion violated the rules of civilized warfare. Fourth, Those who may be disqualified by the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen, and those who have been disqualified from registering to vote for delegates to the convention to frame a constitution for the State of Arkansas, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplemental thereto. Fifth, Those who shall have been convicted of treason, embezzlement of public funds, malfeasance in office, crimes punishable by law with imprisonment in the penitentiary, or bribery. Sixth, Those who are idiots or insane. Provided, That all persons included in the first, second, third, and fourth subdivisions of this section, who have openly advocated or who have voted for the reconstruction proposed by Congress, and accept the equality of all men before the law, shall be deemed qualified electors under this constitution.

SEC. 4. The General Assembly shall have the power, by a two-thirds vote of each House, approved by the Governor, to remove the disabilities included in the first, second, third, and fourth subdivisions of section three of this article, when it appears that such person applying for relief from such disabilities has in good faith returned to his allegiance to the Government of the United States: Provided, The General Assembly shall have no power to remove the disabilities of any person embraced in the aforesaid subdivisions who, after the adoption of this constitution by the convention, persists in opposing the acts of Congress and reconstruction thereunder.

SEC. 5. All persons before registering or voting must take and subscribe the following oath: "I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and maintain the Constitution and laws of the United States and the constitution and laws of the State of Arkansas; that I am not excluded from registering or voting by any of the clauses in the first, second, third, or fourth subdivisions of Article VIII of the constitution of the State of Arkansas; that I will never countenance or aid in the secession of this State from the United States; that I accept the civil and political equality of all men, and agree not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men; and, furthermore, that I will not in any way injure, or countenance in others any attempt to injure, any person or persons on account of past or present support of the Government of the United States, the laws of the United States, or the principle of the political and civil equality of all men, or for affiliation with any political party: Provided, That if any person shall knowingly and falsely take any oath in this constitution prescribed, such person so offending, and being thereof duly convicted, shall be subject to the pains, penalties, and disabilities which by law are provided for the punishment of the crime of willful and corrupt perjury.

SEC. 6. Electors shall in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest and civil process during their attendance at elections and in going to and returning from the same.

SEC. 7. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to enact adequate laws giving protection against the evils arising from the use of intoxicating liquors at elections.

ARTICLE IX.

Education.

SECTION 1. A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence among all classes being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, the General Assembly shall establish and maintain a system of free schools for the gratuitous instruction of all persons in this State between the ages of five and twenty-one years, and the funds appropriated for the support of common schools shall be distributed to the several counties in proportion to the number of children and youths therein between the ages of five and twenty-one years, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, but no religious or other sect or sects shall ever have any exclusive right to or control of any part of the school funds of this State.

SEC. 2. The supervision of public schools shall be vested in a superintendent of public instruction and such other officers as the General Assembly shall provide. The superintendent of public instruction shall receive such salary and perform such duties as shall be prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. The General Assembly shall establish and maintain a State University, with departments for instruction in teaching, in agriculture, and the natural sciences, as soon as the public school fund will permit.

SEC. 4. The proceeds of all lands that have been or hereafter may be granted by the United States to this State, and not otherwise appropriated by the United States or this State, also all mines, stocks, bonds, lands, and other property, now belonging to any fund for purposes of education, also the net proceeds of all sales of lands and other property and effects that may accrue to this State by escheat, or from sales of estrays or from unclaimed dividends or distributive shares of the estates of deceased persons, or from fines, penalties, or forfeitures; also any proceeds of the sales of public lands which may have been or may be hereafter paid over to this State, (Congress consenting); also all the grants, gifts, or devises that have been or hereafter may be made to this State and not otherwise appropriated by the tenure of the grant, gift, or devise, shall be securely invested and sacredly preserved as a public school fund, which shall be the common property of the State. The annual income of which fund, together with one dollar per capita to be annually assessed on every male inhabitant of this State over the age of twenty-one years, and so much of the ordinary annual revenue of the State as may be necessary, shall be faithfully appropriated for establishing and maintaining the free schools and the University, in this article provided for, and for no other uses or purposes whatever.

SEC. 5. No part of the public school fund shall be invested in the stocks or bonds or other obligations of any State, or any county, city, town, or corporation. The stocks belonging to any school fund or university fund, shall be sold in such manner and at such times as the General Assembly shall prescribe, and the proceeds thereof, and the proceeds of the sales of any lands or other property which now belong, or may hereafter belong, to said school fund, may be invested in the bonds of the United States.

SEC. 6. No township or school district shall receive any portion of the public school fund unless a free school shall have been kept therein for not less than three months during the year, for which distribution thereof is made. The General Assembly shall require by law that every child of sufficient mental and physical ability shall attend the public schools during the period between the ages of five and eighteen years for a term equivalent to three years, unless educated by other means.

SEC. 7. In case the public school fund shall be insufficient to sustain a free school at least three months in every year in each school district in this State, the General Assembly shall provide by law for raising such deficiency by levying such tax upon all taxable property in each county, township, or school district as may be deemed proper.

SEC. 8. The General Assembly shall, as far as it can be done without infringing upon vested rights, reduce all lands, monies, or other property, used or held for school purposes in the various counties of this State, into the public school fund herein provided for.

SEC. 9. Provision shall also be made, by general laws, for raising such sum or sums of money by taxation, or otherwise in each school district, as may be necessary for the building and furnishing of a sufficient number of suitable school-houses for the accommodation of all the pupils within the limits of the several school districts.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, I think, sir, that these provisions of this constitution are the best answer to the arguments against it. I only wish to say in addition that it is a little remarkable to find the gentlemen who have for two years been clamoring for the admission of the unreconstructed States and abusing this side of the House because we were unwilling to admit them to representation on this floor, on what was alleged to be purely partisan grounds, should now oppose their admission for the simple reason that their constitution secures equal rights to all men, and that their State governments are in the hands of loyal instead of disloyal men.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. BLAINE. I desire merely to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the other side of the Chamber, [Mr. Woodward,] who made a very emphatic declaration in regard to the character of the constitution presented by the State of Arkansas and of the general movement there as being adverse of republicanism. He says the constitution bears no evidence of being republican in form. I desire to ask the attention of the honorable gentleman, whose memory extends much further than mine, to a circumstance that happened here about twenty-two years ago, when Arkansas was originally admitted into the Union, and when she was admitted with a State constitution tolerating slavery, and also forbidding the Legislature of that State, at any time, to take any measure toward the abolition of slavery. That was the constitution under which Arkansas was originally admitted. I desire to ask the honorable gentleman whether in his creed to-day he holds that that was a republican constitution?

Mr. WOODWARD. That question is not here for us to settle. The gentleman says it was decided twenty-two years ago. I submit that our ancestors decided it, and I suppose they decided that Arkansas had a republican constitution.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not ask what they decided. The gentleman was somewhat fierce in his criticism upon this side of the House, and I wanted to know what was his opinion of that constitution.

Mr. WOODWARD. I had no opinion on the subject. It was not a question for me.

Mr. BLAINE. Why, the gentleman was then in public life very honorably in his and my native State.

Mr. WOODWARD. The gentleman must ask me relevant questions if he asks me any. That question is not here.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, it is very relevant. Here are two constitutions of Arkansas—one under which she was admitted twenty-two years ago, and one under which we propose to admit her to-day. The gentleman has been very severe and caustic in his criticism upon the action proposed to be taken to-day. He contrasts with it the status of Arkansas, which he says has existed as a State under the Constitution, which we are making war on. I desire to ask him whether he considers that constitution which forbids the Legislature of the State to take any measures looking to the abolition of human slavery a republican constitution?

Mr. WOODWARD. In answer to the gentleman I would say that the Government of the United States, having admitted Arkansas into the Federal Union under a constitution with whose provisions I am not familiar, all question that she had a republican form of government was concluded then and there, has never been opened since, and is not open now.

Mr. BLAINE. If I were a lawyer I should say to the learned judge that he confesses and avoids, because the issue he has raised here to-day was that we had revolutionized Arkansas and made war upon it, and all to preserve that very constitution which upheld slavery.

Mr. WOODWARD. Slavery does not exist in Arkansas under that constitution to-day. Why? Because the Federal Constitution has been amended with the consent of Arkansas.

Mr. BLAINE. But the gentleman has advised us that there was to be a great exposure of these matters by the judiciary, that all these questions were to be ripped up; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] told us that matters were to roll back, and roll back, and roll back, until the ancient status was reached. The gentleman cannot escape in that way, because we do not know how far these judicial exposures and interpretations are to go; it may be to the extent of saying that the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery was not, after all, adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. This discussion is out of order, if the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has expired.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not yet expired.

Mr. BLAINE. I would suggest that the Chair does not need the monitions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] to enable him to perform his duties.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has expired.

Mr. BLAINE. I have done all I wanted.

Mr. ROBINSON. And I have done all I wanted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I did not expect my colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] to ask the questions he has asked. Has he forgotten Missouri, which was admitted into the Union upon a condition precedent, and she was to go out of the Union if that condition was ever violated? Has he forgotten Illinois, which, by express terms like those, was never to permit slavery to be introduced within her limits? Has he forgotten Michigan, which was admitted upon a condition precedent? Has he forgotten Texas? He is a lawyer and has been a judge, and yet he gets up here and tells us that this condition in this bill for the readmission of Arkansas, precisely similar to, though not so strong as, one of those I have mentioned, is a great objection to the readmission of that State. Sir, I have no pity for the gentleman; but if I had known he was going to make such an exposure of himself I would not have let him in at all. [Laughter.]

Now, all I have to say is this: this constitution of Arkansas has been before us for four weeks, fairly printed. Four weeks have those had who are vigilant and active; and all time would be of no importance to a sluggard, for he would require from now till eternity, and even eternity would find him unprepared.

I think that this constitution is above all suspicion, and I am a little scrupulous and particular about any constitution I am called upon to vote for. Now, with a constitution with which I can find no fault, after it has been so long before us, I cannot for a moment conceive that there has not been time enough allowed for all of us to become acquainted with it. And as in equity that is presumed to be done which should be done, which ought to be done, therefore it is to be presumed that there is not a man in this House who does not know all about this constitution. The law says so; equity says so; my learned colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] would tell you that was the equity of the case. I hope, therefore, that we shall vote upon this constitution, and that we shall readmit Arkansas into the Union.

I know there has been a great clamor raised against this side of the House for keeping out those non-reconstructed States. By whom has that clamor been raised? By gentlemen upon the other side. And the only reason I can conceive of why their voice now sounds so differently is that it comes out of the other side of their mouths. [Laughter.] They have been clamoring for months, because we refused to let these States in, because we would not admit their Representatives and Senators to participate with their friends and brethren in the legislation of the country, and help to carry into effect the great principles which they and all of us—for I hope these gentlemen on the other side are coming now to be in favor of liberty—the great principles which all of us do or ought to maintain.

I therefore cannot think that there is anything illiberal in disposing of this question to-day. Gentlemen on the other side have occupied nearly the whole time. I gave to my colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] nearly half an hour, which he laughed to scorn; for when I wanted a few minutes of the time I had given him he said I should not have it. I trust that the vote will be taken, and that everybody will be satisfied. Representatives of freemen come here duly elected according to the certificates of the very men appointed by the present Administration, men who have been all along the friends of that Administration. Besides that, we have now here a certificate of the Secretary of State, in which he declares officially that Arkansas has adopted the fourteenth constitutional amendment. A few days ago official information was sent to him of the action of that State; but being a good deal concerned about his household and Cabinet affairs, [laughter,] and having also on hand, as a friend suggests to me, the Alta Vela matter, he could not find time to send down the certificate to us till I "took a rule on him," as we say in the courts, and the certificate was extracted from him. I was very sorry I had to treat him in the manner I did. I have that certificate now in my hand, and I send it to the Clerk's desk that it may be filed as a part of our proceedings. I now call for the vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I believe it is now in order to move that the House adjourn. I make that motion.

The question being taken, it was declared decided in the negative.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—yeas 21, naves 91; less than one fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to ask a question. I wish to know whether this bill, when we vote upon it, cannot be divided. I had not read the bill till a few moments ago; but I find that while the first part provides for the admission of the State, the last part provides for keeping it out; and unless the question can be divided I shall be compelled to vote against the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. A resolution is susceptible of division when it has two or more parts, each of which is capable of standing by itself; but a bill cannot be divided under any circumstances.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 32, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Price, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burd Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and the Speaker—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Bock, Cary, Eldridge, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Knott, Loan, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Mungen, Niblack, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, Thomas Williams, and Woodward—32.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Fields, Finney, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Logan, Mallory, Maynard, McCullough, Morrissey, Mullins, Nicholson, Polsley, Pomeroy, Raum, Selye, Shellabarger, Starkweather, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, John T. Wilson, and Wood—47.

When the roll-call was concluded,

The SPEAKER said: The occupant of the chair, as a member of the House, votes in the affirmative.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to move an amendment to the title.

The SPEAKER. It is before the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to amend it so it will read "a bill to keep Arkansas out of the Union as an equal and independent State." The people of Arkansas are not now admitted under this bill unless they submit to despotism and dictation.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The title was then adopted as already stated.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the title was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, was allowed to print his speech in the Globe on the subject just disposed of. [See Appendix.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JONES and Mr. DAWES were granted leave of absence for one week.

GOVERNMENT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 255) declaring the officers-elect of the State of South Carolina to be the provisional government of said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

ADMISSION OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1044) to admit the State of South Carolina to representation in Congress; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN ST. LOUIS.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 256) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a commission to examine certain buildings in the city of St. Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PILE. I ask that the joint resolution be passed at this time. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a commission of three competent persons to make the necessary examination and report, first, as to the necessity of new buildings for the purpose of post office and United States court room and necessary offices in the city of St. Louis, Missouri; second, as to the adaptability and suitability of the building known as the Polytechnic Institute, the cost at which it can be obtained, and what will be the probable cost of constructing a suitable building for the purpose above named.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. PILE. If I am allowed to make a brief statement, I think the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the references just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FELIX A. SALTER, ETC.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back House bill No. 653, for the relief of Felix A. Salter, and joint resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota relating to the New Ulm mill, and moved that they be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF IRON-CLADS.

Mr. VAN WYCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Retrenchment, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered; and agreed to:

Whereas the iron-clads Oncota and Catawba were sold by the Navy Department to Swift & Co. April 2, 1868; and whereas there is reason to believe said vessels were obtained by said Swift & Co. with the design to dispose of and deliver the same to the Government of Peru, then and now in a state of war with a Power friendly to this Government: Therefore,
Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to forthwith order the seizure and detention of said vessels until the matter can be investigated by Congress.

Mr. VAN WYCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1868; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to make it a special order?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not.

The SPEAKER. Unless it is made a special order it allows unlimited debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let it then be made a special order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Monday next after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to submit the views of the minority of the Committee on Appropriations on two bills, namely, House bills Nos. 541 and 859, in relation to appropriations for benevolent institutions for the District of Columbia, for the purpose of having the views printed. I desire to state that, before handing them to the Clerk to have them printed there are some blanks which I want to fill up.

No objection being made, the views of the minority were ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPALDING. I give notice that on Monday morning next, after the morning hour, I will move to go into the Committee of the Whole on those bills.

REUBEN DAILEY.

Mr. STOKES. I ask consent to report back from the Committee of Claims the petition of Reuben Dailey, of Memphis, Tennessee, and ask that the committee may be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to the change of reference.

Mr. STOKES. If the gentleman will allow me I think I can satisfy him that it is proper to have the petition referred to the Judiciary Committee. It is a petition for compensation for services rendered as Attorney General of the United States court. It is a very little matter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is nothing but a claim against the Government, and the Committee on the Judiciary have nothing to do with it properly. It belongs to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is manifest, on examination of the paper, that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I still object.

The question was taken on referring the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary; and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. STOKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the petition was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN H. HAYES.

Mr. HARDING, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of relieving Lieutenant John H. Hayes, of company I, eleventh Illinois cavalry, for the loss of one year's pay in the Union Army, and that they report to this House thereon.

AMERICAN COMMERCE.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement by way of explanation and correction of the remarks by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Not personal?

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir; a correction of some statements concerning the city of Baltimore and its commerce.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. How long?

Mr. PHELPS. Ten minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is this a personal explanation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it is not.

No objection was made.

Mr. PHELPS. In the course of his speech on the joint resolution before the House yesterday directing the sending of vessels of war to the Gulf of St. Lawrence for the purpose of protecting the New England fishermen in those waters, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] made the following remarks:

"We have not only given up producing steamships in this country, but we hail with joy the enterprise of a foreigner if he will but introduce a steamship line anywhere upon this coast. The large city of Baltimore, with two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, celebrated in former days for its tonnage, producing that remarkable specimen of naval architecture formerly known as the Baltimore clipper, has to-day not only given up its efforts at foreign commerce, but celebrated a gala day a short time since, the day on which a Clyde steamer arrived in the harbor, as a precursor of a line established there to do the business of importing and exporting such goods as Baltimore might desire to buy or to send abroad. The citizens turned out in the street and welcomed the first arrival of steamers that the enterprising Liverpool firm had concluded to send to that imbecile port. They were as glad as Hong Kong might be at the arrival of the Pacific mail steamers first ship! That is the condition to which the great city of Baltimore is reduced to-day; and it is but a specimen of the position of the other cities of this continent. From the port of New York there sails on an average one sea-going steamship every day, built in Europe, and no one of them flies at her masthead the stars and stripes as her national emblem. The best of our American line, the Fulton and the Arago, were sold at auction the other day in New York, to be hustled off and broken up as old iron. In the place of those vessels we have from foreign ship-yards magnificent specimens of naval architecture sailing every day into and out of the port of New York, plying between that city and Liverpool, Queenstown, Southampton, Havre, and other European ports, every one of them under a foreign flag; and when any of our gentlemen tourists go abroad for pleasure, as many thousands of them do annually, they go under the foreign flag, of course!"

I regret that I was not in my seat when these remarks fell from the gentleman from Maine. Had I been I should have requested permission to correct him on the spot, inasmuch as they contain several statements which, no doubt inadvertently, the gentleman has made in contravention of the facts.

In the first place, the population of Baltimore, instead of being two hundred and fifty thousand, as the gentleman has stated, is estimated by those most familiar with the subject; and the best judges, to be over three hundred thousand. Instead of the steamer which is spoken of here as being the cause of all this demonstration, being a Clyde steamer, owned by a Liverpool firm, it was a steamer belonging to a line established by the joint enterprise and joint capital of the North German Lloyd's and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Maryland, and the most of whose capital is owned in that State. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has contributed one half to the capital of this line of steamers, the balance being contributed by the North German Lloyd's. They have already two first-class steamers of over two thousand tons burden plying between the ports of Bremen and Baltimore, and the occasion to which the gentleman refers was the arrival at the city of Baltimore of the pioneer steamer of that line. She has since been followed by her consort, and will be followed by two more vessels to be placed on the line, making in all four.

The gentleman is incorrect in saying that there is at this time no line of steamers plying between this country and Europe supported by American enterprise and capital. So far as the remarks apply to the port of New York, they are doubtless true. I am not aware that there is a line of steamers flying the American flag at their mastheads now afloat between the port of New York and any port in Europe; I am not aware that there is any such line afloat between any port in the United States and any European port except from this "imbecile port" of Baltimore. We have there a line of steamers plying regularly between the ports of Liverpool and Baltimore, the capital of which is exclusively owned in the State of Maryland by the same corporation to which I have referred. They have three first-class steamers—the Worcester, the Somerset, and the Carroll—running regularly, and so far as I know those are the only steamers plying between this country and Europe belonging to a company organized under American laws, and controlled by American capital and floating at their mastheads the American flag. And this line, dependent exclusively upon Maryland enterprise for its support, has never asked nor received a dollar by way of subsidy from the national Treasury.

Mr. PIKE. Where do those steamers run to?

Mr. PHELPS. To Liverpool.

Mr. PIKE. And the two you first referred to?

Mr. PHELPS. They run to Bremen.

Mr. PIKE. Are they American steamers or foreign?

Mr. PHELPS. The steamers were built in the Clyde, but they are owned in Baltimore.

Mr. PIKE. That is the very point I was making to this House, and I ask a few moments to reestablish the point in the minds of the House. The large city of Baltimore, which in 1860 had two hundred and twelve thousand inhabitants, and to-day I supposed had two hundred and fifty thousand—I am glad to hear it has three hundred thousand—has to send across the Atlantic and have its steamers built in the Clyde, because, under your laws, they cannot be built in Baltimore. If those steamers could have been built in Baltimore the enterprising merchants of that city would have built them there. But they could not. They were obliged to send their money across the Atlantic and have the steamers built in the Clyde and run under a foreign flag. It is the same in New York. I stated yesterday that foreign merchants located in New York, owning foreign vessels, were doing the importing business of this country and the exporting business of this country, and doing it under a foreign flag; and that artisans in Great Britain, the Millwall Company, the Lairds at Birkenhead—

Mr. PHELPS. I must decline to yield further. I do not take issue with the gentleman's general line of remarks in regard to the decay of the ship-building interest of the country, which I deplore as much as he does. On that question I agree with him entirely; but I object to his illustration; I object to his singling out the port of Baltimore to illustrate the decline of the commerce of the country, when it is in point of fact the only American city that has a line of steamers owned in this country plying to a European port.

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman will allow me a word further, I will say that I singled out the port of Baltimore for this purpose, because the enterprise of Baltimore was sufficient, under favorable laws, to produce one of the finest specimens of naval architecture that the naval history of this country has ever known; that was the Baltimore clipper, known in former days the world over, wherever the American flag was known. And to-day, if you will but allow it, the port of Baltimore, with its favorable situation as the entrepot of the whole trade of that section of the country watered by the Chesapeake and its inlets, would rival New York, and New York and Baltimore together, instead of succumbing to Liverpool and London in the great carrying trade of the world, would build you a fleet of ships that would go to Europe and do our carrying trade there; would go to the West Indies and do our trade there; go to Mexico, to South America, go everywhere where there is salt water, and do the carrying trade of the world. If you will but permit the enterprise of Baltimore and New York, and of my own State of Maine, to compete with foreigners, we will do the carrying trade of the world.

But, crushed down as they are to-day, laboring under the disadvantages imposed upon them, they cannot do it; and the imbecility which now characterizes the foreign trade enterprise of Baltimore characterizes also the cities of Philadelphia and New York, and all our efforts for the control of the seas. My remark had no special reference to the city of Baltimore.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PHELPS] has expired.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask for five minutes more. No objection was made.

Mr. PHELPS. After the explanation of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] his recognition of the enterprise of the city of Baltimore, and the appreciation he has shown of its great natural advantages, which constitute it the natural depot of the South—and I may add of the great West and Northwest also—it is hardly necessary for me to say anything further.

As for the term "imbecile," which the gentleman is reported to have applied to the port of Baltimore, I attached no particular significance to it, for I rather supposed it must have been a mistake of the reporters or a typographical error. How the gentleman, coming from the section he represents, and speaking in behalf of the fishing interests, could stop to challenge attention to the imbecility of anything was more than I could understand. If there is anything upon the Atlantic sea-board that might properly be called "imbecile" the gentleman's fisheries, which have from time immemorial clamored for and obtained Government bounties, and were only yesterday asking through the gentleman from Maine himself, and receiving from the favor of this House, the protection of a fleet of national armed cruisers, might perhaps deserve that compliment. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE. I hope the House will allow me two minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. PIKE. I placed it on the ground of imbecility; I applied that to all our foreign commerce and to the men engaged in foreign commerce; for however vigorous a man may be naturally he may have grown up to the full stature of a man, if you bind his arms and tie his legs with withes so that he can neither strike out nor walk, for all active purposes he is an imbecile. That is the condition of the merchants, of the ship-builders of Baltimore, to-day. That is the condition of the ship-builders of Philadelphia, represented here by my friend on my left, [Mr. MYERS.] Ay, it is the condition of the ship-builders of New York, where there is not to-day a single keel laid in the ship-yards of Webb and others, for they are bound hand and foot by your infamous navigation laws.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask unanimous consent of the House to make a statement.

No objection was made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was absent when the vote was taken this afternoon on the Arkansas bill. I ask leave to record my vote upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, as he has repeatedly stated heretofore, that under the rules he cannot ask unanimous consent for the purpose of allowing any gentleman to record his vote. The object can be attained only by a suspension of the rules when a motion for that purpose is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire, then, to say that if I had been here I should have voted against the bill for the admission of Arkansas.

Mr. GETZ. I desire to say that I, too, was absent from my seat when that vote was taken. If I had been present I should have voted in the negative.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to withdraw his motion to adjourn for the purpose of enabling me to move to suspend the rules that the House may resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for debate only. My colleague [Mr. Cook] desires to make a speech to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it understood that no business shall be transacted after the House goes into the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That will be the understanding.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it proposed to make speeches in favor of impeachment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague, when he makes his speech, can answer for himself as to what his subject is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to any speeches in this House on the subject of impeachment while the question is pending in the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe I must insist on my motion that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 38, noes 54; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. HOLMAN and PERHAM.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 4, noes 64.

The SPEAKER. On this question no quorum has voted. In the opinion of the Chair, however, a quorum is in the Hall. The Chair will state that when members refuse to obey their own rules he can decide their conduct out of order, but he is powerless to enforce those rules. When members refuse to obey the rules it is, as the Chair has heretofore stated in rulings on other questions recently, a matter for the House to determine, not for himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] desires to address the committee this afternoon because he is about to leave the city; and, if there is no objection, I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COOK. I will say that my speech is not on the question of impeachment, but only refers to it incidentally.

There being no objection, the motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the President's message.

The SPEAKER. It is the understanding that no business will be transacted to-day after the House has resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. Cook was entitled to the floor.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss the disagreement between Congress and the President; to show how, after being elected by the same party as the representatives of the same political principles, they have come to occupy positions so irreconcilable. The Constitution provides that—

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

In this language is implied the proposition that a State may be in this Union, and yet be without a republican form of government. The Union was made to be a perpetual Union, and yet some States might lose their republican form of government either by having the State government existing under the Constitution of the United States utterly overthrown or else perverted into some other form, and to prevent this possibility it was provided that the United States should guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government. The word "guarantee" means to warrant, to become responsible for, to undertake for another that if that other does not do the thing for which the guarantee is given the party guarantying will himself do it. The evident meaning of this clause of the Constitution is, that if any State in this Union fails to maintain a republican form of government the United States will take such steps as may be necessary to restore and maintain such republican State government.

When the people of the southern States, to secure and extend the great wrong and crime of human slavery, deposed and overthrew the State governments which had existed in those States under the Constitution of the United States, it became the duty of the United States to execute the guarantee given in the Constitution, either by causing the State governments which had been overthrown to be reestablished, or by providing for the creation of new State governments republican in form. In the execution of this guarantee the national Government had the right to put down by force the unconstitutional and usurping State governments which had been set up in the rebellious States. The national armies did not enter the rebellious States "to protect them against domestic violence upon the call of the Legislatures or the executive of such States." They went there to remove obstructions to the maintenance of constitutional republican governments within them. It is clear that when the rebellion was suppressed it was impossible to restore the constitutional governments that had existed in those States before the rebellion. Those governments had been so utterly overthrown that they could not be restored or reconstructed, because the men who held the executive, legislative, and judicial power under those States had themselves become traitors, renounced their allegiance to the United States, and sworn allegiance to the rebel confederacy, and even if they had continued loyal their tenure of office would have expired before the conclusion of the war. It is equally clear that no legal governments had been set up in their place. The governments in actual existence at that time in those States were governments in hostility to the Government of the United States. Their officers were sworn to support the constitution of the so-called Confederate States, or, in other words, to overthrow the Constitution of the United States, so far as they should have power to do so. Such State governments had no legal power to enact any law which could rightfully bind any citizen of the United States; indeed, the very existence of those governments was an act of treason, and when the Constitution and laws of the United States were restored those rebel State governments were of necessity destroyed, so that when the war closed no State governments existed in those States, and the clamor which has been made that these rebel States have always been States in the Union, and therefore were entitled to immediate representation in Congress at the close of the war, if it means anything, means this: that Senators in the United States Senate might be selected from the State in which there was no Legislature to elect them, and members of the House of Representatives be elected from a State in which there was no Legislature to establish representative districts or to provide by law for the election of Representatives.

The fact that there were no legal State governments in those States at the close of the war was admitted by every one at the North. The President, in his proclamation in relation to the State of North Carolina, declared that the rebellion had, in its revolutionary progress, deprived the people of that State of all civil government. It was conceded by the entire South, for no Governor, judge, or legislator claimed the right to continue the exercise of the functions of any office which he had exercised under the so-called confederate government. The exigency contemplated and provided for in the Constitution had occurred. There were States in this Union which had not a republican form of government. They had no legal form of State government whatever. The United States were solemnly bound by the Constitution to guaranty to those States a republican form of government. The republican governments existing before the war could not be restored, for the reasons already stated. The Constitution then required that the United States should provide for setting up anew republican governments in the States which had by their rebellion destroyed their constitutional governments. The manner in which this constitutional duty should be performed, and the department of the national Government which should carry out this constitutional obligation, and in so doing should determine the manner of doing it, have been the questions that have divided the political parties of the country since the final suppression of the rebellion.

It has been agreed among all parties that the United States, when the rebellion was suppressed, had the right to intervene in the rebellious States for the purpose of setting up republican State governments in accord with the national Government under the Constitution. The first point of controversy was whether this should be done by the President of his own motion, and in accordance with his individual view of the manner in which it should be done, or whether the exercise of this great power should be under the control of the people through their representatives, and on this point the President chose to separate himself from the political party by whom he was elected, and to claim for himself the unqualified right to determine finally the manner in which, and the terms upon which, the governments of those States should be reconstructed, which included the power to determine what for all time to come should be the condition of the millions of persons made free by the proclamation of emancipation, and what should be the measure of protection afforded to them by the national Government which they had aided in preserving; to determine what should be the security provided for the Union men of the South who had arrayed against themselves the bitter hostility of those who had striven to overthrow the national Government, and whose only hope of protection was in the help of the Government which they had periled all things to maintain; to determine what measure of power in the reconstructed State governments, and in the Congress of the United States, should be placed in the hands of those men who had violated every obligation resting upon them to support and defend the Constitution and laws of the nation, and who, by their causeless and wicked rebellion, had brought upon the country the terrible sacrifices and the long agony of the civil war.

These were grave questions. The future welfare and prosperity of the whole country, the national honor, the public faith were all involved in the right solution of them. The claim made by the President, of the right to decide these questions himself and according to his individual view of the justice and propriety of the course to be adopted, was the most monstrous claim of power ever put forth by any man since the foundation of our Government. The measures adopted by the President to assert and enforce this claim of power in himself have consequently been wholly without precedent in its history. He did not insist that the State governments then existing in fact were clothed with any authority, as did the Democratic party, but, on the 10th of May, 1865, General Canby telegraphed to General Warren, in Mississippi, by direction of the President:

"You will not recognize any officer of the confederate or State government within the limits of your command as authorized to exercise in any manner whatever the functions of their late offices. You will prevent by force, if necessary, any attempt of any of the Legislatures of the States in insurrection to assemble for legislative purposes, and will imprison any member or other persons who may attempt to exercise these functions in opposition to your orders."

In pursuance of this claim of power the President called upon a certain portion of the people of those States to elect delegates to form new State constitutions; he declared who should be entitled to vote and who should be eligible to office; he disfranchised one race who had been loyal during the war solely on account of their color; he permitted all paroled soldiers of the rebel army and all rebel officers under the rank of colonel and all soldiers and officers of the rebel navy under the rank of lieutenant to vote in reconstructing the State government provided they should take an amnesty oath prescribed by himself alone.

A careful examination of the proclamation of the President of May 29, 1865, for the institution of measures to reconstruct the State of North Carolina, and which was a model for all the proclamations issued by him in reference to the other States, will disclose this fact beyond all doubt or question: that in every State in which the majority of the white male citizens over twenty-one years of age had participated in the rebellion the power of reconstructing the State government would be left in rebel hands, and when reconstructed the power of the State in the national councils would be left with the enemies of the Government. It is also manifest the white Union men of the southern States who risked so much and suffered so much for their devotion to the country would be left in the power of their enemies, receiving no measure of protection other than might be accorded to them by the men who have been arrayed against them in deadly hostility for years, and that the freedmen who had been emancipated by the nation, and who had been in great numbers enrolled in our armies, would be placed without protection or security in the power of the men who had periled life and fortune in the effort to perpetuate and extend the slavery of their race, and who are now bitterly exasperated against them on account of their emancipation by force and their sympathy with the national cause.

It will not be contended by any one that the United States could interpose in a State for the protection of either Union men or freedmen after the State government should have been reorganized, and recognized as the rightful government of the State. No one will assert that the General Government can intervene to set aside the statutes of the State of New York or Illinois or the judgments of their courts, nor could such intervention properly be made in the States of South Carolina or Mississippi after they had resumed their relations to the Government of the United States.

The Union Republican party of the country, by whose Representatives the measures were adopted and the forces set in motion by which the rebellion was crushed and the national life preserved, insisted that the claim of power thus put forth by the President was usurpation, and the principles of reconstruction adopted by him were unwise, unjust, and, so far as the Union men and freedmen of the South were concerned, were a plain violation of national faith and honor. They insisted that the guarantee of the Constitution should be executed by law, to be enacted by the people through their Representatives, and in executing this guarantee the measures of reconstruction should be such as to secure to the freedmen the equal protection of the laws; that if the southern States should deny to the freedmen the right of voting or of participating in the Government, that they should not be counted in determining the number of Representatives in Congress to which such States should be entitled; in other words, that the rebel States should not have greater power in the Government than they had before the rebellion by reason thereof. Three fifths of the slaves had been counted in a basis of representation; all the freedmen must now be counted; if, therefore, the freedmen should have no other voice in the Government than the slaves had, the white rebels would have increased their numbers and power in Congress by their rebellion.

The Republican party also insisted that no person who had taken an oath as a member of Congress or as an officer of the United States to support the Constitution of the United States, and had engaged in the rebellion, should again take his place in Congress to make laws for loyal men, or should hold office under the United States—in other words, that leading rebels who had violated an oath once solemnly taken should not again be trusted with the safety of the nation. It also insisted that before the rebellious States should again be admitted to an equal share in the Government that the validity of the public debt and the debt for the payment of the pensions and bounties of soldiers should not be questioned. These things were embodied in an amendment to the Constitution known as the fourteenth article, upon the adoption of which and the organization of the new State governments in conformity thereto it offered to receive into Congress the Representatives of those States.

The leaders of the rebellion have been the leaders of the Democratic party in the nation. By their influence and power in the party they have committed it to all those measures looking to the extension and perpetuation of slavery which have alienated so many of the northern members of the party as to secure the election of Mr. Lincoln. The defection of so large a portion of the Democratic party as that which went into rebellion, actively and openly, left that party in a minority, and deprived them of the political power which they had enjoyed so long, that it seemed almost an inalienable right. As the readiest means of securing a return to political power and party ascendancy they looked to a reunion with their former allies, who had now become rebels, and were willing to do anything to conciliate and nothing to exasperate them. At first they denied the constitutional power to coerce rebel States; or, in other words, they denied the right of the United States to guaranty constitutional republican governments in those States. This was the doctrine of Mr. Buchanan, the last Democratic President, after the conflict of arms actually began. They sought to carry it on in a way which should do as little damage to the enemy as possible. They refused to give refuge in our camps to the slaves of rebels, but returned them to aid in the service of the rebellion. They refused to allow negroes to fight in the armies of the nation. They opposed and denounced the proclamation of emancipation, that great measure of justice and policy which gave the final and decisive victory to our arms; and when it was proposed to secure forever to the negro that freedom which the nation had given him by the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution forever prohibiting slavery the whole Democratic party voted solidly against the proposition. It was passed in the House of Representatives by the following vote: ayes 119, (over a hundred of whom were Republicans,) noes 56, (all Democrats.)

In looking back over the history of the last eight years we can now clearly see that if the Democratic party had been in power when the rebellion actually began it would not have been put down by force and the nation would have been divided. If that party had been in power when the contest was at its highest, when day by day hundreds of our bravest and best men were giving their lives for the country, it would have given up the contest and have allowed the nation to have perished rather than have overthrown the institution of slavery, for the day when the emancipation proclamation was issued was the day of extremest danger, and when the constitutional amendment was adopted in Congress it had become evident that the rebellion could only be subdued by depriving it of the great element of its strength—the unrequited labor of millions of slaves. After the negroes had shown their fidelity and attachment to the Union cause in innumerable forms, after they had protected, aided, and fed so many of our soldiers escaping from the hell of a rebel military prison; after we had enrolled them in the national armies, and after they had proven their manliness upon many well-fought fields, where thousands of them laid down their lives for the nation, the Democratic party would have surrendered them up once more to the tender mercies of their rebel masters. Entertaining these sentiments, it is not strange that the party should have rallied to the support of the policy of the President. It is true that his policy did not recognize the rebel State governments existing at the close of the rebellion as legal State governments as they would have done, but it placed the power in the hands of rebels and traitors to organize new State governments by which the same great end could be secured, namely, the reconstruction of the Democratic party at the South and its reinstatement in place and power. The President's policy did not actually return the negroes to a condition of chattel slavery—the constitutional amendment against which they had struggled so earnestly prevented that; but it placed them completely under the control of their former masters, denying them the civil rights of American citizens, and, what was more desirable still, it would add an additional two fifths to be counted as a basis upon which southern Democrats could be sent to Congress in greatly increased numbers. That policy did not in terms repudiate the debt of the nation and the payment of the bounties and pensions to soldiers and their families, but it did provide that rebels should have a voice in the determination of those questions greater in proportion to their numbers than loyal men should have, because they should not only represent the entire number of rebel whites, but should misrepresent the millions of loyal blacks.

The ends they sought could be attained by supporting the policy of the President, yet untried, equally well as by their own, which had been disastrously defeated, and so the Democratic party rallied with one accord to the defense and support of the President and his policy. The nuptial rites between the two were publicly solemnized at Philadelphia, where the corporal's guard of apostate Republicans who had abandoned their party and principles for presidential favor and patronage affiliated with the Democratic party, amid as much decorous weeping and unmeaning congratulations as are commonly found at the marriage ceremonies of parties whose aim is to substitute show for substance, and from this time the history of the conflict of parties is a record of the Republican Union party on one side and the President and the Democratic party in alliance on the other. The President has from that date been engaged in removing from office the Republicans who supported and elected him, and filling their places with Democrats who derided and denounced him, in many instances removing maimed and crippled soldiers from office and replacing them with those who had no claim but faithfulness to the Democratic party.

This policy of the President, which is indorsed and supported by the Democratic party, is, first, the assertion of the power of the President to determine individually and finally all the grave questions embraced in the reconstruction of State governments in the southern States; to determine who should vote and who should be disfranchised; who should hold office and who should be ineligible; whether the government, when reconstructed, was republican in form; in short, to determine at his single will the great questions which should shape the destiny and control the condition of the inhabitants of those States for ages to come, and that the law-making power of the nation must be silent and powerless while he alone should determine the future history of the nation. Said the President in his proclamation of May 29, 1865:

"Whereas the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government; and whereas the President of the United States is by the Constitution made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, as well as chief civil executive officer of the United States, and is bound by solemn oath faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States, and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and whereas the rebellion in its revolutionary progress deprived the State of North Carolina of all civil government; and whereas it becomes necessary and proper to carry out and enforce the obligations of the United States to the people of North Carolina in securing them in the enjoyment of a republican form of government; now, therefore, in obedience to the high and solemn duties imposed upon me by the Constitution of the United States, &c."

The proclamation then goes on to give minute directions how a republican government should be set up in North Carolina, and what portion of the people should have a voice in forming it. It will be seen that this claim of power is in substance this: that the President has the power by his own single will to carry into effect any provision of the Constitution which imposes a duty upon the Government of the United States. He claims the right to execute in his own way the clause requiring the United States to guaranty to every State a republican form of government; that for the purpose of executing this guarantee he is the United States. Let us compare this claim with the Constitution itself. The powers of the President are limited and defined in that instrument. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. He may, with the advice and consent of the Senate, make treaties, appoint public officers. He may appoint officers to fill vacancies happening in the recess of the Senate, who shall hold their offices until the end of the next session of the Senate. He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may on extraordinary occasions convene Congress, and in case of the disagreement between the Houses as to the time of adjournment he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

Now, under which of these powers vested in the President by the Constitution does he derive the right himself to carry into execution that clause of the Constitution which requires the United States to guaranty to every State a republican form of government? Certainly under none of them. He must therefore claim that the President is under obligation to execute the Constitution as well as the laws; in other words, that where the Constitution has imposed a duty upon, or vested a power in, the United States, or the Government of the United States, that it becomes the duty of the President, either as "Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy" or as "chief civil executive officer of the United States," (for he does not tell us in his proclamations upon which of these offices he rests the power,) to carry such power into execution. This seems to me to be a perfectly just and fair statement of the claim of power put forth by the President in his various proclamations for the establishment of new State governments in the southern States, and which power he has attempted to exercise in defiance of the Constitution and law—a power which, if it did exist as claimed by the President, would give him the absolute irresponsible power to mold and shape the institutions and destinies of those States for ages to come. If he had the constitutional power to require those States to adopt the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, he had the same constitutional right to require them to refuse to adopt it. If he had the constitutional right to require them to repudiate the rebel debt, he had the constitutional right to require them to pay it. If he had the right to say that only those white voters who would take his amnesty oath should vote, he had the same right to determine that there should be impartial suffrage in the election of delegates to form new State constitutions.

But this whole claim of powers on the part of the President is in defiance of the Constitution and an usurpation of the powers of Congress. What does the President say in his proclamation is the foundation of the right to intervene in the way he has done in reconstructing the governments of these States? He derives the power expressly from the clause of the Constitution which requires the United States to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. That is a power not given to the President, but to the United States, and the Constitution provides, article one, section eight, that Congress—

"Shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."

Language could not be used which would more plainly and distinctly confer upon Congress the right to make all laws necessary for the due execution of the power of the "United States to guaranty to the States in rebellion a republican form of government." The assumption of this power by the President was therefore an unqualified act of usurpation, and it was committed for the purpose of placing the political power of the southern States, and thereby of the whole nation, in the hands of the Democratic party, and of carrying out the statement made by him to Stanley Mathews, who testified before the Reconstruction Committee as follows:

"I had an interview with Mr. Johnson in February, 1865, at the Barrett House, in Cincinnati, where he was stopping, on his way to Washington, to be inaugurated as Vice President. In it he said that very great changes have taken place in Tennessee since I have been there; that many of those who at first were the best Union men had turned to be the worst rebels, and many of those who were originally the worst rebels were now the best Union men. I expressed surprise and regret at what he said in reference to the matter. We were sitting near each other on the sofa. He then turned to me and said, 'You and I were old Democrats.' I said yes. He then said, 'I will tell you what it is; if this country is ever to be saved it is to be done through the old Democratic party.' I made no reply."

When the Thirty-Ninth Congress met it was, of course, unwilling to sustain the President in an usurpation of power so gross and palpable and so dangerous in its tendencies; and although a very large majority of that body belonged to the political party which elected the acting President, yet it immediately appeared that it would neither sustain the President in the monstrous assumption of power which he had made, nor approve of the plan of reconstruction which he had adopted, which was, in truth, only the reorganization of the State governments in the hands of those who had been the armed enemies of the nation, and which State governments had proved themselves either incompetent or unwilling to afford security or protection to loyal men; and whose practical workings were illustrated at Memphis and New Orleans where men were slain in heaps for no crime but loyalty to the country and hatred of treason.

The Congress proposed to the southern States as its plan of reconstruction that the States which had lost their legal State governments by rebellion should be admitted to representation again in Congress when they should have adopted an amendment to the Constitution which should provide for equal civil rights for all persons before the law; second, for equal representation, so that those men who were excluded from all voice in the Government on account of their color should not be counted in the basis of representation. In other words, that a rule should not be established which would, in a State where the white and colored population was equal, give representation and control in the Government to every voter just equal to that of two northern voters; that if the negro was of too inferior a race to vote he should not be allowed to control the Government; that if his name was used at all to determine affairs of national interest he should use it himself, and not another, who would use it contrary to his wishes; third, that perjured men, who, as members of Congress or public officers, had sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and then had used their utmost endeavors to destroy it, should not again be intrusted with power either to make or execute the laws of the nation; and fourth, that the debt of the nation should be paid, and the bounties and pensions provided by law for soldiers and their families should be paid, and that the debt created to aid the rebellion should not be paid; and these views they embodied in amendment to the Constitution, which is as follows:

"SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

"SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

"SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

"SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

The Democrats, seeing that the second clause of this amendment would greatly lessen the strength which their old allies—the rebels of the South—could bring back to the Democratic party in the nation when they should be reconstructed, and finding that the aim of the President was identical with their own, joined with him to defeat this wise, equitable, and most moderate plan of reconstruction—the vote on the passage of the resolution submitting the amendment being in the House, ayes 128, all Republicans, nays 37, all Democrats; and after the ratification of this amendment by the States of Ohio and New Jersey, Democrats, as soon as power has been placed in their hands, have formally repealed such ratification so far as they had power to do so. While the southern States were considering this necessary, just, and moderate proposition, its rejection by those States was secured by the direct and personal interference of the President himself. On the 17th day of January, 1867, Governor Parsons, of Alabama, and the President discussed the question by telegraph, as follows:

Governor Parsons to the President, January 17, 1867.

"Legislature in session. Efforts making to reconsider vote on constitutional amendment. Reports from Washington say it is probable an enabling act will pass. We do not know what to believe. I find nothing here."

The President to Governor Parsons, January 17, 1867.

"What possible good can be obtained by reconsidering the constitutional amendment? I know of none in the present posture of affairs, and I do not believe the people of the whole country will sustain any set of individuals in attempts to change the whole character of our Government by enabling acts or otherwise. I believe, on the contrary, that they will eventually uphold all who had patriotism and courage to stand by the Constitution and who place their confidence in the people. There should be no flinching on the part of those who are honest in their determination to sustain the several coordinate departments of the Government in accordance with its original design."

This dispatch had the effect to secure the rejection of the constitutional amendment, which was followed by the same action by the other rebellious States. Here, then, was the issue. The Democratic party and President Johnson, on one side, contended that the government of those States should be placed in the hands of those who had but lately been the armed enemies of the country, and that the Union men and the freedmen should be placed in their power without protection or defense; that the very result of the rebellion should give to the rebel States an additional power in Congress and in all national affairs equal to two fifths of the late slave population, and all this for the sole purpose of bringing back into the fold of the Democratic party the rebels of the South, who had once been the controlling and inspiring element of the party; and that such reconstruction should be based upon the exercise of the usurped power by the President to execute in his own manner and upon his personal will the guarantees of the Constitution.

On the other side of this issue was the Republican Union party of the country, maintaining that Congress should pass laws to carry into execution the guarantees of the Constitution, and that the obligation resting upon the United States to guaranty a republican form of government to the rebel States which had been left by the rebellion without any civil governments whatever, should be so carried into execution as to secure liberty to the freedmen by requiring that no State should make or enforce any law which should abridge the rights of citizens of the United States, nor deny to any one within its jurisdiction the due protection of the laws; that the rebels of the South should not have in addition to an equal representation with the North a representation based upon the negro population whom they did not permit to vote and whose wishes and interests they did not represent; that persons who had, like Jeff. Davis, Floyd, and Breckinridge held high office in the Government and betrayed and well-nigh ruined the Government whose Constitution they had solemnly sworn to support, should not again be intrusted with power over loyal men, and that the public faith should be preserved by paying the debt incurred to save the nation and the pensions and bounties which had been promised them by law. Upon this issue the parties appealed to the great tribunal of last resort, the American people, and the people responded by electing the Fortieth Congress, in which was a largely increased Republican majority, and elected by magnificent popular majorities largely increased over those of the previous Congress.

The people, to whom the President in his speeches always appeals, did decide against the plan of reconstruction adopted by the President and against the power claimed by him. And this verdict, overwhelming and decisive as it was, was rendered after the President had been fully heard in his own person in support of his policy, after he had swung around the circle before the American people, haranguing them at the cross-roads; and this verdict could not have been given in ignorance of the Constitution, for the President had taken care to leave it with the people in every place where he had given his luminous interpretation of it to them. The people, by an immense majority of the whole, did express their desire that this amendment should be incorporated into the Constitution. If the President had acknowledged the doctrine that the will of the people is the supreme law of a republic the controversy would have ended. The people further expressed their will in this regard by electing Legislatures in twenty-three States that promptly ratified the amendment. On one side of the issue was ranged the entire number of States which had been united in the maintenance of the Union; on the other the northern Democratic party, the southern rebels, and Andrew Johnson. If the verdict of the people was to be carried into effect, the duty of the Fortieth Congress thus elected and on this issue was plain, so to legislate that the principles embodied in the constitutional amendment should become part of the fundamental law. This was the precise instruction of the people who elected this Congress. The Congress could not evade it without being recreant to the pledges its members had made and upon the strength of which it had been elected. In consequence of the bitter hostility of Andrew Johnson, aided by the Democratic party, to that amendment, a hostility which wielded the immense patronage of the national Government in its support, it became impossible to secure the adoption of the amendment by the rebels of the South, who, under the plan of the President, were left in full control of the States which had been in rebellion.

If the constitutional amendment must be accepted by three fourths of the States, including the States lately in rebellion and now without organized State governments, before it became a part of the Constitution, as the Democratic party and the President with one voice agree, then there remained but one mode by which this could be accomplished, and that was by submitting the question to all the people of those States, giving to a rebel no advantage over a loyal man on account of his color. The instruction of the people to this Congress, so emphatically given at the ballot-box, could in no other way be obeyed. In the meantime the lives and property of the Union men and freedmen of the South, under the working of the President's plan, had been denied any practical protection of the law, which was a necessary result of the fact that the law was made and administered by rebels.

Two courses of action were open to the Fortieth Congress. One was to disobey the instructions of the people by whom it was elected; to abandon the constitutional amendment; to afford no protection to the Union men and freedmen of the South; to leave them unprotected in the power of their enemies; to consent that those who had evinced such a desire to destroy this Government that no danger or suffering could deter them from making the effort, should again be permitted to hold seats in Congress, with an increase of the power which they had before the war, the use of which the country yet shudders to remember was sufficient to seize men and women under the free skies of the North and drag them into hopeless slavery; and to compel the free men of the North to join the hunt or be themselves incarcerated in prison; and with this increase of power to vote upon the question whether the debt incurred to put down the rebellion and the pledges made by the Government of bounties and pensions to its maimed and disabled soldiers and their families. Or to provide by law for the protection of the Union men and freedmen by temporary military governments, and to submit the creation of a new State government to all the people of the South, the loyal blacks as well as the disloyal whites, and so secure State governments loyal to the Union, able and willing to protect Union men and freedmen, and so provide against any possibility of a renewal of the strife between the sections of the country, and secure the adoption of the amendment of the Constitution which had been approved by the people.

The Congress did not hesitate. Laws were passed over the veto of the President which have resulted in the creation of new State governments republican in form in most of these States; and not republican in form alone, but in spirit and in truth, which will be in entire harmony with the other portions of the country, and which will be able to prevent the possibility of future civil war by themselves taking proper care of the rebel element in their midst, which will afford adequate protection and security to Union men and freedmen, and which will secure the adoption of the constitutional amendment by a sufficient number of States to satisfy the scruples of Andrew Johnson himself. The passage of these laws of course excited the intense indignation of the President and his allies of the Democratic party. The one saw his claim to control the destinies of the nation by his single will and in accordance with his personal views and wishes scornfully brushed away by the Representatives of the people and his cherished policy set at naught. The other saw their party deprived of the strength and political power it was to have secured by the restoration of its old friends and allies to political influence, and they joined in the clamor raised to defame, and the efforts made to destroy the congressional plan of reconstruction.

The duty imposed upon the President by the Constitution was not to make laws or enforce policies of government, but to execute the laws; his practice has been to announce and endeavor to carry out his policy and to prevent the execution of the laws. He did prevent the ratification of the constitutional amendment by the southern States and thereby he did prevent the reconstruction of the Union, and however much the President or his allies may charge the Republican party or Congress with keeping the nation divided, the fact remains that if Andrew Johnson had not by the aid of the Democratic party opposed and prevented the ratification of the constitutional amendment by the southern States, the nation would have long ago been united upon a plan approved and ratified by the American people. Upon the passage of the reconstruction measures by Congress over his veto he addressed himself not to the task of executing them, as he was sworn to do, but to the task of evading and defeating their execution.

Time will permit me to refer to but few of the many acts done by the President in furtherance of this purpose: the open and avowed use of the patronage of the Government for the purpose of defeating the adoption of the State constitutions formed under the law of Congress, and for defeating the execution of the law, until such prostitution of patronage has resulted in an alarming decrease of the revenue through the frauds of corrupt officials so appointed; and retained in office after their incompetency and venality had been made apparent, contrary to the earnest and repeated appeals made for their removal by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, until opposition to the reconstruction policy of Congress has taken the organized form of plundering the national Treasury.

Then followed the removal from command of officers of the Army, eminent for their public services, because they would not be made the instruments of violating the law they were bound to execute. What had General Sickles done that he should be relieved from his command and held unfit for the duties of his office? Why was General Pope relieved from his command, or what caused the removal from his command of the gallant Phil. Sheridan, whose courage and conduct had again and again snatched victory from the very jaws of defeat, and called forth the warmest admiration and gratitude of the nation, in the solemn and eventful days when the life of the nation was staked upon the issue of the doubtful struggle? Yet he was removed, notwithstanding the earnest and repeated entreaty of the General of the Army that he should be continued in command.

Now, is it not certain that these officers would not have been removed if the President had been willing that the reconstruction laws should have been carried into execution; that the only reason why the President and General Grant could not agree upon the propriety of retaining General Sheridan in command was the fact that the President desired that the execution of the reconstruction laws should be obstructed, and General Grant desired that their execution should not be obstructed? Why was General Swayne removed from command in Alabama, but for the reason that he would not tolerate a practice of keeping voters from the polls by force or intimidation or fraud, and would insist upon the execution of the laws? His removal gave such encouragement to the rebel element in that State that they were enabled to keep voters from the polls in sufficient numbers to prevent a majority of the registered voters of the State from voting for the constitution; and so the President did succeed in obstructing the execution of the law which he had sworn to execute. In all these acts he has had the entire support of the Democratic party, their real object being to secure to their old allies, the rebels, the same power they had before the war; and to secure this end the main article in their creed has become an assertion that a visible admixture of negro blood should deprive a man of the right of suffrage; that the right of self-government depends not at all upon intelligence, not at all upon moral character, but wholly upon the faintest perceptible shade of color.

The President, in the further prosecution of his policy, attempted to control the entire Army in opposition to the congressional plan of reconstruction. He had beaten reconstruction in Alabama. Let him secure this entire military control, and the same results could be accomplished in the other States; and to secure this end it became necessary to remove the able and patriotic Secretary, whose personal efforts had done more to save the country from ruin than those of almost any other. But a law enacted under every constitutional form stood in the way of his purpose. His first attempt was to induce General Grant to violate the law. Hitherto his efforts had been directed to the evasion and obstruction of the law he had sworn to execute; now he openly solicited the General of the Army to flagrantly violate its provisions, promising to shield him from its penalty, as by the exercise of the pardoning power he could readily do. It would it have been for the country if the President had found in the commander of the Army a man as faithless and unscrupulous as himself. But he found a sense of public duty and a regard for law so strong as to thwart all his plans and to enkindle his bitter animosity. He then attempted to secure the coöperation of those other great commanders, Generals Sherman and Thomas, in aid of his schemes by offers of preferment and power, but the heroes who had proven their courage and skill in war illustrated no less their fidelity and patriotism in peace by rejecting with scarcely concealed contempt the tempting baits held out to them; and while the contest between the law and the man whose office and duty it was to execute it was being thus carried on, and while a Republican majority of more than two thirds in each House of Congress having the power to impeach and remove the President, (who was almost the only obstacle to the reconstruction of the Union,) magnanimously forbore to exercise that power in the belief that the law was more powerful than any man; the President startled and shocked the country by claiming for himself, not only the prerogative of refusing to execute the law, and so to totally suspend its operation, which was the same claim of prerogative that cost Charles I his head and James II his throne, but also the right himself personally to violate the provisions of a law passed under all the most solemn forms of the Constitution, himself judicially to determine when a law is constitutional, to suspend its operation, to violate its provisions if he believes it to be unconstitutional, although two thirds of each branch of the representatives of the people, after hearing the President and considering his reasons, affirmed the constitutionality of the law upon their oaths. This arrogant claim of power to embody in himself the combined executive, legislative, and judicial functions of the Government is now for the first time in the history of our Government made by Andrew Johnson.

"On what meat hath this our Cæsar fed
That he hath grown so great?"

The President of the United States has no greater immunity for a violation of the law than the humblest citizen. A reason which would justly shield the President from punishment for a violation of the tenure-of-office act would also justly shield any man from punishment for the violation of any law. Suppose a Mormon indicted for a violation of the law against polygamy, pleading that he was of opinion that the law is unconstitutional, because it interferes with the exercise of his religion; suppose a southern rebel indicted for treason, pleading that in his belief secession was a constitutional right; if such a plea may be accepted from Andrew Johnson or Brigham Young or Jefferson Davis it is the overthrow of all law, and if it is accepted in the one case it must be in the other. But it was not simply the violation of law on the part of the President, but such a usurpation of power as endangered the safety of the Republic. He claimed the right to remove from office, during the session of the Senate, and without its consent, any officer of the Government and to fill the place with one of his own creatures—a power plainly in conflict with the Constitution, because it swept away the right vested by the Constitution in the Senate to confirm or reject his nominations to office, and placed an uncontrolled power in his hands dangerous to the liberties of the people.

When we had vainly struggled for years to suppress the rebellion and not touch the institution of slavery, we were forced to this precise point—either give up your country or the institution of slavery. One final choice between them is yet permitted you; and accepting the choice which divine Providence had placed in our hands, our martyred President, imploring the favorable judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God upon the act, "bade the slave be free;" and from that day victory perched upon our banner; our armies passed in triumph from Donaldson to Vicksburg, Altoona, Chattanooga, and to the sea; and from thence to join the other victorious army at Richmond, and to finally obliterate the last vestige of armed treason from the land. The gracious favor of Almighty God rested upon the nation.

When we strove to inaugurate loyal governments in the rebellious States, and at the same time deny all the rights of manhood to loyal men because they were not of an orthodox color, we were foiled at every step; we accomplished nothing; we were again brought fairly to face this question: will you give up the purpose of creating loyal State governments in the South, or will you agree to unqualified manhood suffrage there? Again we accepted the situation; called on loyal men as well as rebels to assist in forming those governments, and now we see Louisiana, Georgia, Arkansas, North Carolina, and South Carolina with loyal State governments already formed and only waiting our recognition. In those States true men are in power and all danger from treason has passed. Again we struggled to maintain the purity of our institutions and the dignity and supremacy of our laws, and to bear with a bold, bad man in the presidential chair who endangered both.

Again we were confronted with the solemn question: will you give up your Constitution to be outraged, your laws to be violated and scorned, or will you again rise to the great urgency of the hour, and remove from power the man who sets himself above the law? and the answer has been given before the Senate and the nation, when our Representatives, in the name of this House and of all the people of the United States, solemnly impeached Andrew Johnson of high crimes and misdemeanors, and the issue remains with the Senate; and not with the Senate only, but far more with the people, the only sovereign tribunal. And upon the just decision of this solemn issue rest the questions:

Whether in this land of ours the President or the people have sovereign power?

Whether the irresponsible will of one man or the law of the land shall be supreme?

Whether the President shall seize and use the immense and increasing patronage of the nation to oppose the national will and obstruct the execution of the law, thereby corrupting the very fountains of order and public security; or whether this great nation, reunited, purged from her old stains, forever secure in the intelligence and public virtue of her people, shall stand forth among the nations the grandest illustration in human history of the triumph of liberty and of the vindication of law.

Mr. KERR obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CULLOM reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, had come to no resolution thereon.

CONSTITUTION OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask unanimous consent that the constitution of South Carolina be ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. That would be business; and there was an understanding that no business should be transacted after the House had gone into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDING. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) adjourned till Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ADAMS: The petition of Mrs. Margaret Johnston, of Garrard county, Kentucky, praying for pension on account of the services of her husband, Captain David Johnston.

By Mr. JENCKES: The petition of C. B. Farnsworth and others, for removal of obstructions in Pawtucket river.

Also, the petition of Edward J. Mallett, for compensation for services as consular agent at Florence, Italy.

By Mr. LINCOLN: The petition of W. H. Gleazen and others, for a mail route between the coast of Florida and Nassau, New Providence.

By Mr. McCARTHY: The petition of Eleazer Clark and other firms and individuals of Syracuse, importers and dealers in lumber, asking that the duty on imported lumber be changed from ad valorem to specific.

By Mr. NUNN: The petition of Mrs. Frances Erickson, of Tennessee, asking relief for services rendered the Government by her late husband.

By Mr. STOKES: The petition of Susannah Thompson, of Kentucky, for a pension.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 11, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order, and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at eleven o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. CONNESS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened; and

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, the Senate adjourned to meet at half past eleven o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 11, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is calling the States and Territories (commencing with the State of Maine) for bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider; during which call resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELIOT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1046) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES, ETC.

Mr. MILLER introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 257) declaring that it is inexpedient for this Government to enter into a treaty with any foreign Power which tends to discriminate against the manufactures or productions in any part of the United States and give such foreign Power an undue advantage over the industry of our country; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CONSULAR OFFICERS.

Mr. KELSEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1047) to fix the compensation of certain consular officers, to provide for their supervision and the verification of their accounts, and to prohibit their collection of fees not authorized by law; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WELKER. The Committee on Retrenchment has that subject under consideration, and I suggest that the bill be referred to that committee.

Mr. KELSEY. I am willing it should be referred to that committee.

It was accordingly referred to the Committee on Retrenchment, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF LIFE.

Mr. WELKER presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, relative to a request to Congress to take measures to prevent the loss of life on the waters under the jurisdiction of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PROTEST AGAINST RECONSTRUCTION ACTS.

Mr. VAN TRUMP presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, protesting against the reconstruction acts of Congress and against the passage of certain bills now pending therein, and instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress to vote for the repeal of the former and against the passage of the latter; which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the resolutions be read.

The SPEAKER. That is generally done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I object.

JUSTIN A. GOODHUE.

Mr. BEATTY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1048) for payment to Justin A. Goodhue, company C, twenty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TERRE HAUTE AND RICHMOND RAILROAD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1049) for the relief of the president and directors of the Terre Haute and Richmond Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ELIZABETH DESMOND.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1057) for the relief of Elizabeth Desmond, of the county of Washington, State of Maine, widow of Patrick Desmond; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PORTRAIT OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

Mr. WARD introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 260) for the purchase of a full-length portrait of the late President Lincoln; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER. The call of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions having been completed, the remainder of the morning hour will be occupied in calling the States and Territories for resolutions in the inverse order, commencing with the State of Indiana, where the call rested on the 23d of March last.

RECESS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I offer the following concurrent resolution, and demand the previous question thereon:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That at the adjournment on Friday, the 15th instant, a recess be taken until Monday, the 26th instant.

Mr. SPALDING. I suppose that is in order to enable us to take up the carpets.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does it require ten days to take up the carpets?

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it to take up the carpet-baggers? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. UPSON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 54, noes 52.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I call for tellers on that motion.

Mr. BEAMAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 62, nays 62, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Burr, Churchill, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Donnelly, Driggs, Eli, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Harding, Hunter, Johnson, Julian, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Marvin, Moore, Morgan, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Poland, Raum, Sawyer, Seofield, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Windom, and Woodbridge—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Arnell, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Cake, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Garfield, Getz, Hawkins, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Judd, Kerr, Laffin, Lincoln, Logan, Marshall, McCarthy, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Niblack, Nunn, Peters, Pile, Polsley, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Thomas, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodward—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Barnes, Barnum, Benton, Bromwell, Butler, Chanler, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Ferriss, Fields, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Koons, Lynch, Maynard, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, Mercer, Morrissey, Mullins, Nicholson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Randall, Robertson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Taber, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—65.

The Speaker voted in the affirmative.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put that motion, but as the resolution is privileged it would not prevent it from being offered again.

Mr. DRIGGS. If the resolution can be renewed, I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is privileged, being in regard to adjournment.

Mr. DRIGGS. Then I withdraw my motion.

SOUTHERN ELECTIONS.

Mr. COBURN. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the General of the Army be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the number of votes cast for and against the constitutions of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Alabama, respectively, at the recent elections in said States.

Mr. BROOKS. I suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana that the call should be made through the Secretary of War. That has hitherto been the usual course.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is right enough as it is.

Mr. COBURN. I decline to modify the resolution. The General of the Army has possession of this information.

Mr. BROOKS. Hitherto it has always been the custom to call for information, not upon military officers directly, but through the Department of War.

Mr. PAINE. I object to debate.

Mr. COBURN. I will say that this information is desired by the Reconstruction Committee.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to—ayes eighty-one, noes not counted.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WATCHMEN IN PUBLIC GROUNDS, ETC.

Mr. SHANKS. I offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and upon it I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for organizing under the engineer department, instead of any and all laws now authorizing the employment of watchmen for public buildings and grounds, a corps of fifty, more or less, as may be necessary, maimed, wounded, or disabled Union soldiers of the late war, who have been honorably discharged from the military service, who shall act as watchmen in the grounds of the Capitol, the Executive Mansion, the Smithsonian Institution, the Botanic Garden, the Agricultural Department, the Washington monument, La Fayette square, Franklin square, Lincoln square, the Circle, and such other public grounds and buildings as need protection.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SHANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLORADO EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit the following joint resolution for consideration at the present time, and upon it I call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order, under the operation of the previous question.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 261) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition was received, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes and empowers the Secretary of War to issue such commissary and quartermaster stores to the expedition engaged in the exploration of the river Colorado, under direction of Professor Powell, as may be necessary to enable the expedition to prosecute its work; provided that such issue is not detrimental to the military service.

Mr. GARFIELD. In explanation of this joint resolution I would ask attention to the following letters in my possession:

ILLINOIS NATIONAL HISTORY SOCIETY,
NORMAL, ILLINOIS, April 2, 1868.

GENERAL: A party of naturalists, under the auspices of the State Normal University of Illinois, wish to make a scientific survey of the Colorado river of the West. This work is to be a continuation of work done last year in north, middle, and south parks.

It is hoped that a survey of that river can be made from its source to the point where the survey made by Lieutenant Ives was stopped.

In addition to the general scientific survey a topographical survey of the region visited will be made. The services of two civil engineers have been secured for this purpose.

I most respectfully request that the proper officers be instructed to issue rations to this party while thus engaged, the party to consist of not more than twenty-five persons.

I need not urge upon your attention the importance of the general scientific survey to the increase of knowledge. It is believed that the grand cañon of the Colorado will give the best geological section on the continent.

Nor is it necessary to plead the value to the War Department of a topographical survey of that wonderful region, inhabited as it is by powerful tribes of Indians, that will doubtless become hostile as the prospector and the pioneer encroach upon their hunting grounds.

You will also observe that the aid asked of the Government is trivial in comparison with what such expeditions have usually cost it. The usual appropriation for such an exploration has been many thousands of dollars.

I transmit herewith a copy of my "preliminary report" to the Board of Education of the State of Illinois on last year's work.

Invoking your favorable consideration of this request, I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

J. W. POWELL,

Secretary Illinois National History Society.

General U. S. GRANT, Commanding U. S. Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 21, 1868.

A true copy. L. H. PELOUZE,
Assistant Adjutant General.

I respectfully recommend that rations be ordered to be issued to Major Powell and his party of twenty-five men by Army commissaries whereon he may call for them while engaged in the exploration of the Colorado river of the West. The work is one of national interest.

April 3, 1868. U. S. GRANT, General.

OFFICE COMMISSARY GENERAL SUBSISTENCE,
April 6, 1868.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War, with the remark that it is believed that "rations" cannot be "issued" to the party as requested without the sanction of law, as its members are not the employees of or in the service of the United States. It is respectfully suggested that the only facilities for their subsistence they, the party, can properly be accorded from the Army subsistence stores is the authority to purchase at the total cost to the United States, at the points of purchase, such subsistence stores as the party may require when they can, in the judgment of the commanding officer, be spared without detriment to the full and proper subsistence of the troops. If this is not deemed satisfactory to the principal of the party it is respectfully suggested that he should obtain the enactment of a law according him such other aid as he may seek.

A. B. EATON,

Commissary General of Subsistence.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 21, 1868.
L. H. PELOUZE,

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION, April 21, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: Permit me to introduce to your acquaintance the bearer of this note, Professor Powell, of the University of Illinois, and to commend his petition to your favorable consideration. He has organized a company of young men to explore the region of the Colorado of the West and desires some assistance from Government in the way of transportation and subsistence.

The expedition is purely one of science and has no relation to personal or pecuniary interests, but is intended to develop the geology, the natural history.

topography, and physical geography of one of the most interesting regions of our continent.

Though the object of the exploration is the advance of science, its results will be of much practical value. The professor intends to give special attention to the hydrology of the mountain system in its relation to agriculture.

The vapor from the Pacific ocean, which would otherwise fertilize the interior of the continent, is stopped on its passage east by the mountains, thus depriving the soil of an essential ingredient of productiveness; but this vapor, in the form of water, may again be reclaimed for the uses of the husbandman by a judicious system of irrigation, founded on a critical knowledge of the hydrology and topography of the country.

The expedition of Professor Powell has the entire approval of the Smithsonian Institution, and will be furnished by it with instructions and such facilities as its means will afford in the way of outfit.

The cost of the assistance which he asks from Government is nothing in comparison with the importance of the knowledge which we may reasonably expect will be obtained.

I am, with much respect, very truly your friend and servant,
JOSEPH HENRY.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD, House of Representatives.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TARIFF

Mr. SPALDING submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed, in preparing a bill regulating the duties on imports, to have regard to an equalization of the amount imported from other countries with the amount exported from the United States, so far as the same can be effected by a judicious tariff.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. MUNGEN. I submit the following resolution, upon which I call the previous question:

Resolved, That the powers and duties of the Committee on the Treatment of Union Soldiers and Prisoners be extended so that they shall inquire into and report upon the treatment of prisoners in the northern camps and prisons; also, upon the conduct of Union officers, civil and military, in relation to the exchange of prisoners; and, also, into any proposition made on the part of the Confederate authorities to our Government for the purpose of obtaining medicines to be sent under charge of Federal surgeons to Andersonville and other southern camps and prisons, and to be used exclusively for the benefit of Union prisoners in those camps and prisons.

Mr. GARFIELD. This information has been furnished by the Department and is now before the House.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 43, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Culom, Donnelly, Eckley, Elia, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Garfield, Halsey, Higby, Chester D. Hubbard, Judd, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Marvin, McCarthy, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Banks, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Harding, Hawkins, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Richard D.

Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Johnson, Julian, Kerr, Knott, Ladin, Mallory, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Niblack, Nunn, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Shaanks, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taffe, Twichell, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, and Woodward—43.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Benton, Blaine, Butler, Chanler, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eggleston, Fields, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonitz, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, Mercer, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Nicholson, Paine, Phelps, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Robertson, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—72.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

RECESS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ECKLEY. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That at the adjournment on Saturday, the 10th instant, a recess be taken until Monday, the 25th instant.

Mr. HARDING. I move that this resolution be laid on the table.

On the motion there were—yeas 44, noes 53.

Mr. HARDING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 69, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Burr, Churchill, Cobb, Coburn, Elia, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Golladay, Grover, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hunter, Julian, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marvin, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, and Woodbridge—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arnell, Bailey, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Butler, Calkins, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Dodge, Eckley, Ferriss, Getz, Halsey, Hawkins, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Judd, Kerr, Ladin, Lincoln, Logan, Marshall, McCarthy, McCormick, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Niblack, Nunn, Peters, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Chanler, Cook, Cornell, Culom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Fields, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Koonitz, Lynch, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, Mercer, Morgan, Morrissey, Mullins, Nicholson, Phelps, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Robertson, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Wood—63.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired; but this being a privileged resolution the expiration of the morning hour does not cut it off.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. This resolution was offered under the call of States; and the States can be called only during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but a privileged resolution, when it comes before the House, has priority over other business. This resolution being properly before the House under the rules the expiration of the morning hour does not cut it off.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It was not offered as a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. It was offered under the call of States; but being a privileged resolution it is before the House until disposed of, notwithstanding the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. HARDING. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKLEY] has called the previous question. Unless he withdraws the call no amendment is now in order.

Mr. HARDING. I would like to offer an amendment providing that we shall not receive any pay for the recess proposed in the resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. If the previous question should not be seconded will the resolution go over?

The SPEAKER. It will not. It must be disposed of. If the previous question should not be seconded the resolution will be open for debate or amendment.

On seconding the previous question there were—yeas 64, noes 35.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The question being on agreeing to the resolution,

Mr. UPSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 67, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Arnell, Bailey, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Butler, Calkins, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferriss, Getz, Halsey, Hawkins, Holman, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Judd, Ladin, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, McCarthy, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Niblack, Nunn, Peters, Pile, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Burr, Churchill, Cobb, Coburn, Culom, Driggs, Elia, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Golladay, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hunter, Johnson, Julian, Kelsey, Kerr, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCormick, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Pike, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Elihu B. Washburne, William Williams, and Woodbridge—67.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Chanler, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Fields, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Haight, Hill, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Koonitz, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, Mercer, Morgan, Morrissey, Mullins, Nicholson, Perham, Phelps, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Robertson, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, John T. Wilson, and Wood—54.

So the resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, one of his Secretaries.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to report a resolution from a select committee. The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee directed to inquire into the truth of the charges made against Hon. I. DONNELLY by Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, and of the charges made by Hon. JAMES BROOKS against Hon. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, be authorized to employ a clerk at a compensation of six dollars per day.

Mr. HARDING. I object.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to suspend the rules.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 72, noes 25.

So the rules were suspended, more than two thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is now before the House.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to amend the resolution by providing that the committee shall be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland and of the House to this fact that this resolution provides that this clerk shall receive two dollars a day more than other clerks.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was about to call attention to that fact myself.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would not object if all the other clerks received the same pay.

Mr. THOMAS. The reason for offering six dollars a day instead of four is to be found in the fact that this clerk will have a short time of service. He will have to make the necessary preparations to perform the duty and yet not be required to be in service more than thirty days. That was the reason for making it six dollars a day.

Mr. ROSS. I move to strike out "six" and insert "four."

Mr. THOMAS. I do not yield for that amendment. I will modify the resolution by striking out "six" and inserting "five."

Mr. ROSS. I think four dollars is enough.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I rise to inquire for information whether this resolution calls for a clerk independent of the stenographer furnished by the House to each committee?

Mr. THOMAS. It does.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There is a stenographer to be furnished and then a clerk beside?

Mr. THOMAS. There is not to be a stenographer especially appointed for this committee. There are stenographers appointed upon whom investigating committees can call when their services are required. This committee proposes to have a clerk to take charge of their papers and to keep a journal of their proceedings. That is the object of the resolution. The House will understand that the stenographer is no additional expense.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is there not an expense for this clerk in addition to the stenographer furnished by the House to take testimony? I understand it is proposed to have a clerk independent of this stenographer.

Mr. THOMAS. I believe that every member of this House is familiar with this machinery, and each gentleman will vote most agreeably to himself. I demand the previous question.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I want the gentleman to give us information as to the necessity for the employment of this clerk.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The rules provide for each committee a stenographer to transcribe the evidence. This committee is appointed for a special purpose, to take testimony and report it to this House, and I can see no necessity for a clerk in addition to a stenographer.

Mr. GARFIELD. No stenographer acts as a clerk.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not suppose there is a member who does not understand the necessity for this clerk. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARDING. I ask that the resolution be divided.

The SPEAKER. It is not susceptible of division.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. THOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, presented a communication from the Governor of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

NORTH CAROLINA AND LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress the accompanying documents, which embrace all the papers that have been submitted to me relating to the proceedings to which they refer in the States of North Carolina and Louisiana.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 11, 1868.

On motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, the message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF PUBLIC VESSELS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith reports from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy, prepared in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th of December last, requesting information respecting the sale of public vessels since the close of the rebellion. No report upon the subject has yet been received from the Department of War.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 8, 1868.

On motion of Mr. PIKE, the message was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIKE. I move that five hundred extra copies be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion goes to the Committee on Printing.

DESTITUTE SEAMEN ABROAD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in answer to their resolution of the 14th ultimo, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1868.

The SPEAKER. The accompanying report is from the United States consul at London, Hon. Freeman H. Morse, in relation to the rights of destitute seamen.

The message and accompanying report were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON CITY CHARTER.

Mr. WELKER. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 475, to extend the charter of Washington city; also to regulate the selection of officers, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The bill was read. It continues in force for one year, or until Congress shall by law determine otherwise, an act entitled "An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington," approved May 17, 1848, and the several amendments thereof now in force.

Section two provides that it shall be the duty of the mayor of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, the board of aldermen, and the board of common council thereof, to assemble in joint convention at the City Hall in said city on the first Tuesday of the first month after the passage of this act, and proceed to select by ballot all officers whose appointments, upon the nomination of the mayor, are now authorized by the charter, or by any law of the United States, or act or ordinance of said city, or which may hereafter be authorized thereby, who shall hold their offices, respectively, for one year, and until a successor is appointed; and on the same day of the month in each year thereafter the joint convention shall proceed to a new selection, provided that no person shall be regarded as incompetent to hold any of said offices or be disqualified therefor who is a qualified elector in said District.

Section three provides that in all the meetings of the mayor of the city of Washington and of the boards of aldermen and common council for the purposes mentioned in the second section of this act the mayor or the president of either of said boards shall preside, and the secretaries of said boards shall act as tellers, and keep a record of the proceedings, and the mayor or any member of either of said boards may nominate one or more persons for the offices required to be filled, and the person having the highest number of votes shall be publicly declared selected, and a certificate of his election shall within five days be made out and be signed by the presiding officer and secretaries and be transmitted to the persons selected, who shall within ten days thereafter enter on the discharge of the duties of his office, which shall be immediately vacated by any person then holding the same.

Section four provides that all questions arising in the joint convention authorized by this act shall be determined by a majority of the votes of the members thereof present at any of its meetings; and it shall have power to adjourn from time to time until all the duties imposed upon it shall be completed, and to require of the persons selected for any office such security as may be deemed necessary. And in the event of any vacancy from disability, death, or resignation, it shall be the duty of the mayor to call a meeting of the joint convention to select a successor for the unexpired term of service.

Section five provides that when the mayor, boards of aldermen, and common council shall be assembled in joint convention, as provided for in this act, they shall by a majority vote designate a bank in which the various moneys of the city of Washington shall be deposited; and they shall make such regulations in relation to the mode in which such funds shall be kept and paid out as shall be deemed advisable for the interests of the city; and within five days after such designation a certificate of the bank selected shall be made out and placed in the hands of the president or cashier thereof, and thereafter it shall not be lawful to retain or deposit the funds of the city, or any part thereof, in any other bank or place.

The last section repeals all acts and ordinances or parts thereof, or parts of the charter of the city of Washington, inconsistent herewith.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. WELKER. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand it requires unanimous consent to take up the bill.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to take it up out of its order, except on Monday, when it can be done by suspending the rules.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WELKER. Is it in order to make a suggestion?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WELKER. The charter of Washington city expires on the 14th of May, and it is important that action be taken now.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand it is a very different motive that causes the gentleman to urge the passage of this bill. The object is to carry the coming election.

Mr. UPSON. Order.

Mr. MUNGEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Upson] objects.

Mr. MUNGEN. May I, then, ask a question of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. If it is strictly parliamentary in character.

Mr. MUNGEN. I desire to ask whether in this bill or in any existing law there is a provision creating the office of city treasurer; and if so, what is the necessity of providing in this bill for the deposit of funds in a bank?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 27, not voting 73—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Poland, Price, Raun, Sawyer, Scofield, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodward—89.

NAVS—Messrs. Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Hohman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Mungen, Niblack, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Stone, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Woodward—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Benton, Bingham, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Cornell, Corvado, Dawes, Dixon, Fields, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Huburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jones, Keicham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, Mercier, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Nicholson, Nunn, Phelps, Pile, Polstey, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Arman, Burt Van Horn, Robert F. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—73.

So, two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was taken up.

Mr. WELKER. I offer the amendments to the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, and I demand the previous question on the amendments and the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a question of order. I desire to have the bill considered by sections, if it be in order.

The SPEAKER. That can be done in Committee of the Whole, but not in the House, upon the demand of any member. It can, however, be done by unanimous consent. The bill is before the House as a whole, and is subject to an amendment and to an amendment to an amendment under parliamentary rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I move, then, to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering it by sections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is on the floor, and has moved the previous question. If the previous question be voted down, the motion of the gentleman will be in order, but not otherwise. Are the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Ohio reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia, or are they individual amendments?

Mr. WELKER. They are individual amendments.

The amendments were read as follows:

First amendment:

In the second section, after the word "Tuesday," strike out the words "the first month after the passage of this act," and insert in lieu thereof "July, 1868."

Second amendment:

At the end of section five add the following, "unless by order of the board;" so that the clause will read:

And thereafter it shall not be lawful to retain or deposit the funds of the city, or any part thereof, in any other bank or place, unless by order of the board.

Third amendment:

After section five insert the following as an additional section:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," passed January 8, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to require electors in the city of Washington to reside in the ward or election precinct in which they shall offer to vote fifteen days prior to the day of any election, instead of three months: Provided, That said section shall not be construed as conferring the elective franchise in said city on non-commissioned officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines, in the regular service of the United States, stationed on or duty in said city, except such as may have become actual residents with their families in said city for one year previous to any election: And provided further, That no person claiming to be a naturalized citizen shall be registered as an elector, nor shall the name of any such person be retained on the list of voters without the production of his naturalization papers or duly certified copies thereof or satisfactory proof of the loss of the same; and for the purpose of correcting said list as regards the aforesaid classes of persons and in all other respects, the judges of election shall meet in some proper place in said city between the hours of nine o'clock a. m. and seven o'clock p. m., on three days instead of two days as now required: And provided further, That all the original lists of voters, both before and after their correction, shall remain in the custody of the member of the board of judges first named in their appointment by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and, in the event of his removal or resignation, in the custody of his regularly appointed successor, except when being copied for publication and for the use of the commissioners of election, and said original lists shall at all times be open for the use and inspection of either of said judges: And provided further, That no property qualification shall be required for any of the offices of said city, and that three days prior to any election each board of commissioners of election shall appoint two clerks to assist them in registering the names of voters in their respective election precinct, and in making returns of the elections, who shall be sworn before the clerk of the supreme court of said District, truly and faithfully to perform their duties, and for any misconduct in office be subject to the same penalties to which said commissioners are now subject: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the judges of election to make any regulation and give any notice which may be proper or necessary to carry out any provision of this section.

Mr. MUNGEN. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question.

Mr. MUNGEN. Will it be in order to move to refer this bill with the pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. If the call for the previous question shall be voted down, it will then be in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole, or to the Committee for the District of Columbia. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has already indicated his intention to move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole should the House refuse to second the previous question.

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. WELKER] whether he will give us some explanation of the reasons and necessity for the passage at this time of a bill of this kind?

Mr. WELKER. I will do so, if desired, after the previous question shall have been sustained.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] must speak upon this bill, if at all, before the previous question is seconded. The rule giving an hour for speaking after the previous question is seconded applies only to bills, &c., reported from committees.

Mr. WELKER. Very well; I will withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill. I hope the gentleman will at least allow it to be read. I propose it in good faith.

Mr. WELKER. I will hear it read.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to move the following as an amendment to the amendment:

And provided further, That male persons of foreign birth over twenty-one years of age who may have resided one year in the District of Columbia and may have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States shall be entitled to vote at any election herein provided for.

Mr. WELKER. I cannot yield for any such amendment to be offered.

I will now explain briefly the necessity for the passage of this bill. The charter of the city of Washington will expire on the 17th day of this month. All of this Senate bill, excepting the first section, which extends the charter for one year, was contained in a bill which the House passed some time since on the report of the Committee for the District of Columbia. The Senate placed on the bill extending the charter the provisions of the bill already passed by the House.

One of the most important changes which the amendment I have offered to-day makes is in relation to the residence of voters in the different wards of the city. By the law as it now exists, regulating suffrage in the District of Columbia, a voter is required to have resided three months in the precinct or ward of the city in which he offers to vote. I propose by my amendment to reduce the time of residence to fifteen days. In most of the States the voter is required to have an actual residence in the township or election precinct for ten days. There are various reasons why, in the District of Columbia, the period of residence should be very much shortened from the period now required by law. Many of the housekeepers are renting their houses by the month. A large part of the population of the District are merely boarders, and their residence in precincts or wards is very often changed, sometimes each month. In a city where residence is changed so frequently as in Washington it strikes me as important to reduce the residence to fifteen days in order to have a fair vote of all the voters here.

Another change proposed is in relation to the election of officers for the city; those that heretofore have been appointed on the nomination of the mayor and ratified or confirmed by the board of aldermen. The bill of the Senate provides that these council boards shall meet together with the mayor, and there, by ballot, elect those officers who heretofore under the law have been appointed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for two or three minutes?

Mr. WELKER. I will yield for an inquiry.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish to make an inquiry merely, though I wish to hear the gentleman upon a point which I will state. I would like to have three or four minutes.

Mr. WELKER. I will give the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. Could not the gentleman make it five?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Oh, it would be very unreasonable for me to ask so much as five minutes.

Mr. WELKER. Three minutes was all the gentleman asked.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I asked for three or four.

Mr. WELKER. I will say four.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am astonished at the gentleman's liberality, and thank him for his kindness and generosity.

I desire the gentleman, before he concludes his remarks in explanation of this bill, to give this House some information as to whether any provision has been made in this bill with respect to the places of holding elections. I am informed it is with very great difficulty that the people of this District find the opportunity to vote, owing to the small number of the election precincts and their consequent crowded condition on election days. I understand that in this whole city of Washington there are but three or four voting precincts in a ward.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him now?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Not now. I hope the gentleman will not take any portion of my four minutes. I will yield to the gentleman, I think, one minute, when I am through.

Mr. Speaker, I was in this city at the time of the last election held here; and at first I was a little disposed to find fault with the white people of the city of Washington for not interesting themselves more in voting. I thought that, having become disgusted by the action of Congress, they were not disposed to do their full duty in exercising the right of suffrage. But on visiting two or three of the voting precincts of the city with a friend I became satisfied that the people could not, if they would, properly exercise the right of suffrage. The crowded state of the polls, the numbers there at five or six o'clock in the afternoon who had been unable to vote, satisfied me conclusively that it was impossible for all of the qualified voters of the city to vote with no more voting precincts than there then were. I think that, if we make any alteration in the charter or any provisions with reference to voting in this city, we ought to provide for the difficulty to which I have referred. There ought certainly to be an opportunity for all the legal voters who desire to cast their votes. And I do not believe that then it was possible for all to vote without greater facilities.

I am told that at the last election the negroes of this city, under command of the leagues and their officers, took possession of the polls before four o'clock in the morning and held them during almost the entire day. The negroes, after voting, would fall out of the ranks, then go back and fall in again; and when they again got near to the place of voting they would step out and allow some fresh one who had not voted to step in and cast his vote. I understand that white men stood in the ranks from early morning till afternoon endeavoring to get an opportunity to cast their votes, but unable to do so, because of their inability to reach the window where they were to vote.

Now, I want the gentleman to put into this bill some amendment which shall give the people of Washington—the white people—a fair chance. I do not ask for any discrimination against the negro; I want them to be fairly dealt with and to have their rights; but I ask that in the legislation of this Congress a white man may be regarded as fully equal to his "colored brother." I mean the gentleman's brother, for I have never become fully satisfied that the negro is the brother of the white man. Now, this bill is being pressed, I understand, with reference to the election. The inspiring motive of gentlemen in suspending the rules and pressing this matter upon the House is based upon the fact that they think they will not be able to carry the elections unless they can place in the hands of the local officers the entire patronage of this District. It is proposed, I understand, to make a radical change, taking away all the patronage of the mayor and giving it into the hands of the local officers of the District. I suppose gentlemen regard this as the only way in which they will be able to elect their candidate for mayor recently nominated, and that they are pressing this bill for that very object. I would like to hear the gentleman upon this question, and I yield him one minute of my time that he may explain.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's four minutes have just expired.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I trust the gentleman will give me another minute, so that I may give it back to him for the purpose of explanation. I want to reward him for his liberality to me which I do really highly appreciate.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to say one word in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] that this bill is pressed now in view of the election that will shortly take place in this city. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that is so; for if this bill is not passed the charter of the city of Washington will expire on the 17th day of this month, and, of course, after its expiration there can be no election for officers under the city charter.

In relation to the other objection that the gentleman makes as to the trouble voters of this District have in approaching the polls to cast their ballots, I have only to say in reply to the gentleman's inquiry that the city councils already have full power and control over that subject, and they have already provided for five precincts in each ward of the city, which will make thirty-five voting places in the city of Washington.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. When was that done?

Mr. WELKER. Within a very short time back.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was it done this morning?

Mr. WELKER. I do not know. It was within the last three or four days.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was informed to-day about twelve o'clock that it had not yet been done.

Mr. WELKER. I am informed that it has been done.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is that really so?

Mr. WELKER. It is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am glad of it; but I fear the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WELKER. I assure the gentleman from Wisconsin that there is no disposition on the part of the city councils to prevent any person voting at the coming election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know of anything else which needs explanation; and I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Where does the gentleman get his information that these precincts have been established? I really think he must be mistaken. I spoke with a prominent gentleman as I came into the Hall about twelve o'clock, and he assured me that it had not been done.

Mr. WELKER. I am sure that it has been done. It was so published in the newspapers.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand that the councils positively refused to do it.

Mr. WELKER. If I could I would give the gentleman from Wisconsin a guarantee that the city councils will do nothing to prevent a fair election.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then the gentleman admits the justice of the provision I have suggested, that there should be more voting places than there were last year?

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the Clerk to read the section disfranchising United States soldiers and naturalized citizens. I wish the attention of that class of the people called to it.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of the section?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know.

Mr. WELKER. There is no such section in the bill. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 21; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WELKER and Mr. ROBINSON.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 19.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The amendments of the committee were adopted; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WELKER demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MUGEN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 27, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Garfield, Gravely, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, Miller, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Poland, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Smith, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Mungen, Niblack, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Stone, Van Aukun, and Van Trump—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Bromwell, Chanler, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jones, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lafin, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Nicholson, Phelps, Pile, Polesky, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—70.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call up the appropriation bill that I reported from the Committee on Appropriations on Friday, and which was made a special order for to-day. It is House bill No. 1045, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether this is to be considered in the House or in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the bill in the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. Under the five-minutes rule?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir. The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to—ayes 71, noes 27.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to have the House pass this bill to-day. The documents which were sent to the committee, being the report of General Meade, showing all the items for which this appropriation is asked; also a letter from General Meade, together with a letter from the Secretary of War setting forth the necessity of passing this bill, were sent to the Printing Office on Friday last, and I expected they would be back here to-day, but from some cause or other they have not yet been printed. I hope, however, as the most urgent necessity exists for the passage of the bill, as General Meade is entirely without money, and large amounts are now due to the registrars and other parties in Georgia who have been employed by the Government, that the House will pass the bill at once.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether this bill includes all the money that will be necessary for this purpose.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This is all that will be necessary up to the close of the present fiscal year. What may be necessary after that time perhaps will depend on the action of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] and myself in regard to admitting Georgia into the Union.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. So far as my action is concerned on this question, I consider Georgia in the Union, and therefore I consider every dollar that is taken out of the northern people to pay the expenses of reconstruction there as downright robbery. That is my opinion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman has expressed his opinion, and I will now ask the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. This deficiency appropriation is for but one military district, the third?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This comprises the third military district, and I may say that the expenses of the district have been much less than those of any district except the first, the district of Virginia. The expenses of the third district have not been, I think, quite half as much as the expenses of the fourth and fifth, comprising Mississippi and Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. Then, if I reason correctly, this being but one district, involving a deficiency of $87,000, and there being four other districts, the deficiency in them would be $348,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman I will say that we have no information of deficiencies from any other district. There may be, but the committee have no information on the subject.

Mr. BROOKS. But the gentleman says the expenses in one of the other districts are less than in the third.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. But the total expenses have been less in the third district than in any other except the first.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, I will ask the gentleman if he is able to give us any information of the possible cost of these reconstruction acts. It is not submitted to us in any printed documents for our information.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am not aware at the present time, although a statement was made, I think, when the former deficiency bill was up, which covers the inquiry of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me reply to the honorable gentleman that when we have a deficiency bill for one district for $87,000, it leads to a very strong supposition that the appropriations which we made had very little basis of calculation, and that the deficiencies are likely to be equally large in the other districts and equally alarming to the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is possible that may be so, but the committee have no information of any further deficiency. I do not say but that there may be other deficiencies.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me suggest, then, that it is unwise to act on large appropriations without some definite information, some official authority. I am surprised that a gentleman generally so careful of the Treasury, and who so well deserves the encomiums of our party, if not of his own, for his careful guardianship of the Treasury, should move in anything of this sort without that official information which we ought to have.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I accede to the proposition of the gentleman from New York that the House is entitled to information, and, if the gentleman insists upon it, I shall postpone this bill until these documents can be printed. The documents are as I stated. I hoped gentlemen would take my word for it and pass the bill at the present time, because there is an urgent necessity for immediate action. General Meade has no money. He has sent his paymasters up here. The wheels of the Government down there are already stopped, and it is very desirable that action should be had at once. But if gentlemen desire it postponed for two or three days, until the documents come in, I shall certainly make no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. I am always loth to act on appropriation bills, or any other bills whatsoever, without official documents, and I am glad the gentleman assents to my proposition that we should abstain from any action until we have official information upon which to act.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to inquire how it is that a deficiency exists in this district and not in others? Was not the appropriation which we made divided among these districts so that this district was apportioned its proper share of the money? And why is it that a deficiency so large exists in this district, and yet the gentleman is not informed whether there will be any deficiency in other districts?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The original estimates which were made for this district were not large enough to cover the absolute expenditures. The estimates for the other districts were larger than they were for this, and the expenditures have been greater than was expected.

If my friend from Wisconsin will pardon me, I do not wish to take up the time of the House at this time, because I hold the floor by the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] If gentlemen insist on postponement I will ask that the bill be set down as the special order to come up after the morning hour on Wednesday, when we shall have all the documents before us.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not ask for delay; I simply desire information. I cannot understand, from anything the gentleman from Illinois has said, how there should be a deficiency in this district, and yet the aggregate sum which we appropriated may yet be unexpended. If that sum remains unexpended, and the other districts are not in need of it, why cannot this district take whatever there may be of the unexpended aggregate sum for its use? It seems to me that the gentleman ought to know whether the whole sum which we appropriated has been expended or not. If any of that sum remains unexpended, why not let General Meade draw upon it, and pay the pressing necessities which are now upon him?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is a very simple answer to all that. The estimate made for this district was not nearly as large as the estimates for the other districts. The estimate has fallen short, and there is this amount of deficiency, and we are under every obligation to pay these sums for which this deficiency occurs.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What was the sum appropriated?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the sum appropriated for this district was $252,000. For the Louisiana district it has been over six hundred thousand dollars, and for the Mississippi district just about the same sum.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was that the last appropriation made?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The whole of the appropriations.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not mean to press on the gentleman from Illinois a postponement of this bill if he does not desire it of his own accord, for it is not I but he that must take the responsibility of indefinite and unknown action. What I wanted to know is the printed items and details of this expenditure before the House votes upon them. And upon those items and details of how this money has gone, for what purpose it has been expended, I think—though it is not for me to think at all upon this matter—I think, however, that the House is entitled at least to some information on that subject. But I leave it to the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to take what course he may deem proper.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] desires further information I think it right and proper that he should have it before he is called upon to vote for an appropriation. If the gentleman says he desires to have this bill postponed until after the morning hour of Wednesday next I will not object.

Mr. BROOKS. I will leave the honorable gentleman to take his own course.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the gentleman does not seem to be very anxious about it I will call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 27, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Bauman, Beatts, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Bulser, Calk, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney, Clark, Cobb, Colburn, Cook, Culum, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Garfield, Gravely, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jencks, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, M. Mori, Marvin, McCauley, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Platts, Poland, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Spalding, Aaron E. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Mungen, Niblack, Prutz, Randall, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Stone, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Woodward—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Archer, Delos B. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Broomall, Buckland, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eggleston, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jones, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonz, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, Mercer, Morgan, Morrissey, Mullins, Nicholson, Nunn, Peters, Phelps, Pile, Polsey, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—74.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that I was absent from the Hall for a brief time on Saturday last, having been misled in consequence of the extension of the hour after the previous question had been ordered, and in that way I lost my vote upon the bill for the admission of Arkansas. I desire to say that if I had been present I should have voted for the admission of Arkansas.

Mr. BURR. I desire to say that I also was absent when that bill was passed. Had I been present I would have voted against the bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SPALDING asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence after to-morrow.

Mr. VAN AERNAM asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence after to-morrow.

DUELING IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will do so.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask leave to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the truth of the report that a duel has been fought in or near the District of Columbia, in pursuance of a challenge or arrangement made within this District between a person in the diplomatic service of the United States and a secretary of one of the foreign legations, and if they find such an offense has been committed to report to this House whether a due respect for the laws of the United States does not require the House to take measures for the removal from office of the diplomatic officer and for the recall by his own Government of the secretary of the legation; and that for the purpose of this inquiry the said committee are empowered to send for persons and papers.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. CHANLER objected.

Mr. JENCKES. I then move to suspend the rules.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I cannot yield for that purpose.

READMISSION OF SOUTH CAROLINA, ETC.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The preamble of the bill states that the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama have, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, framed constitutions of State government which are republican in form, and have adopted said constitutions by large majorities of the votes cast at the elections held for the ratification or rejection of the same.

The first section provides that the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as States of the Union when the Legislatures of said States respectively shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, upon the following fundamental conditions: that the constitutions of said States shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions respectively, except by a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law whereof they shall have been duly convicted; and no person shall ever be held to service or labor as a punishment for crime in said States, except by public officers charged with the custody of convicts by the laws thereof.

The second section provides that if the day fixed for the meeting of the Legislature of either of said States by the constitution thereof shall have passed before the passage of this act such Legislature may be convened within thirty days after the passage of this act by the president of the convention which framed the constitution of such State.

The third section provides that the first section of this act shall take effect when the President of the United States shall officially proclaim the due ratification by the Legislatures of said States respectively of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The SPEAKER. This bill is printed, and can be obtained of the Doorkeeper.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire by what authority this bill has been printed.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question for the Chair to answer; nor does the Chair know.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have sent two or three times for this bill, and have not been able to get it. I would like to know how a bill can be printed without the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer the question. Nor is it a parliamentary inquiry. The bill will be considered as read a first and second time. The question is on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Unless some gentleman desires to debate this question now, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed, and that it be made a special order for next Wednesday after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] propose to allow debate on this bill when it shall be taken up on Wednesday? There are some gentlemen here who desire to debate the bill, and who wish to know whether it is the gentleman's intention, if the bill shall be made a special order, to allow debate, and to what extent? This information will govern us somewhat in the preparation of speeches. We know what the gentleman can do, if he desires, in the way of cutting off debate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have moved the postponement for the very purpose of giving gentlemen an opportunity to debate it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We wish to know whether there has been fixed between the gentleman and his friends any time when he proposes to call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. No, sir. I propose giving an opportunity for debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be postponed and made a special order for next Wednesday after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to give notice of an amendment which I intend to offer to this bill. It is to amend by striking out the following words:

That the constitutions of said States shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions respectively, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law whereof they shall have been duly convicted.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following: That civil and political rights and privileges shall be forever equally secured in said States to all citizens of the United States resident therein, as is now provided in said constitutions respectively.

I ask that this amendment be ordered to be printed with the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH] will yield to me a moment,

I desire to move that all the reports from the President, General Grant, and the Secretary of War relative to elections held in the States named in this bill be printed immediately, so that we may have them before us on Wednesday morning when the bill comes up.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think that order has already been made this morning.

Mr. BECK. All the documents have not yet come in.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to the order being made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that every document on this subject which has been upon the Speaker's table has been ordered to be printed. There may be other communications yet to come in.

Mr. BECK. General Grant has not yet made the report we have called upon him to make to-day.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I believe that report has been presented to-day, and on my motion referred to the committee and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that no communication from the General of the Army has come in to-day: A message from the President, with two accompanying constitutions, has been received and ordered to be printed; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] has offered a resolution calling upon the General of the Army for a variety of information.

Mr. BECK. What I desire is that the reply of the General of the Army to that resolution shall be printed immediately upon its receipt.

The SPEAKER. It may be received to-morrow by the Speaker while the House is in the Committee of the Whole; and, if there be no objection, the Chair will regard it as ordered to be printed immediately upon its receipt.

There was no objection.

CLERKS IN INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House of the number and names of clerks appointed in his Department since the 1st of April last, and by whom recommended.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1059) to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities; which was read a first and second time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill in extenso.

Several members moved to dispense with the reading of the names of the persons who were to be relieved.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope that will be done.

There was no objection; and it was agreed to accordingly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Are we going to pardon people by wholesale? Is this to be done, then, and are we to have no provision of general amnesty?

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin does not object to that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not; but I wish to have in this bill a provision for general amnesty. If we do that, there will be an end of all quarrels, and we will again have restored an era of good feeling.

Mr. CHANLER. Has the further reading of the bill been dispensed with?

The SPEAKER. It has been done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANLER. I called for its reading, and I did not withdraw that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not object at the proper time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I wish to know on what authority, on what information, on what recommendation these names have been placed in this bill for the purpose of amnesty? Has not the committee had recommendations from other localities? Is it not some information in regard to the politics of these men that has caused their names to be reported in this bill? I wish to know whether these men have repented, or whether they have given any better evidence of repentance than the great mass of the southern people? Are not these the men who have fallen down upon their knees and given a pledge to support the political party to which the gentleman belongs? I should like to know about it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the gentleman is through I will answer his questions. I was about to ask the House to dispense with the reading of the names, so that I might make an explanation. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the information upon which the committee has acted; nearly all of these names were recommended by the constitutional convention of North Carolina. I hold in my hands the resolution of that convention recommending these names to Congress as the names of proper persons from whom disabilities should be removed. I will read:

STATE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION,
RALEIGH, N. C., March 17, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith a copy of resolutions as passed by this convention, also a report of the committee on political disabilities as adopted by this body.

I am, your obedient servant,
T. A. BYRNES,
Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Secretary.

Copy of the report of the committee on political disabilities as adopted by the State constitutional convention, March 12, 1868.

Whereas the persons hereinafter named are disqualified to hold office by the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States, known as the "Howard amendment;" and whereas they have evidenced that they are in hearty accord with the reconstruction measures of Congress: Therefore,
Resolved, That we petition the Congress of the United States to remove their disabilities, in accordance with the provisions of the aforementioned article of the Constitution.

COMMITTEE.

J. W. HOOD, Chairman, GEORGE W. GAHAGAN,
A. W. TOURGEE, JAMES HAY,
S. J. FALKNER, R. W. KING,
C. C. JONES, WILLIAM NICHOLSON.

Then follow the names which are included in this bill.

The Committee on Reconstruction also called before them several gentlemen from North Carolina, including the members-elect of Congress from that State, who have evinced by their conduct and the fact that they have received the vote of the loyal people of that State that they are loyal and proper persons from whom disability should be removed. It is the best kind of information the committee could possess itself of, unless, indeed, a committee were appointed to go to North Carolina and inquire into each man's record and conduct during the war and since. That not having been done, we must take such testimony as we can get.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Not now. We believe the report and the resolution of the convention of loyal men of North Carolina, who recommend these men to Congress, to be very good evidence.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is Governor Holden's name in the list?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask whether there is not a good deal of evidence about his loyalty, as to whether he has not a bad character on that score?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If that be so, then it would be a good recommendation to the gentleman from Wisconsin for his vote.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Not at all. I would not go for one man who was rebellious any sooner than another.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am speaking now of the evidence either of loyalty during the war or of proper repentance since the war. I do not suppose anything I may say, or any evidence that the committee has in behalf of these men, will commend itself to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would not take that confession, I must say, as very good evidence on that point.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We have also in addition to the names recommended by the convention inserted a few other names; and so fearful were the committee, I may say, in passing with reference to the names recommended by the convention, that we scrutinized the entire list in connection with gentlemen from North Carolina who were acquainted with those names, and we have stricken out several of them. We struck out all persons with regard to whom we could ascertain that there was any doubt either as to their loyalty during the war or as to their conduct since the war, and have only put into our bill the names of those about whom there is no doubt. They are either men who were loyal during the war and incurred disabilities by reason of holding some office in the State or else they are men who have since the war accepted the reconstruction measures of Congress in good faith and are acting in hearty accord with the loyal people of the State in reconstructing the State government.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is there not some evidence against Mr. Holden?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In addition to that we have incorporated in the bill the names of State officers elected in North Carolina, some of whose names are in the list and some are not. We have incorporated, for instance, the names of Mr. Caldwell, lieutenant governor, Mr. Adams, State auditor, Mr. Harris, superintendent of the public works, Judges Pearson, Dick, Settle, and Reade, of the supreme court, and Judges Thomas, Russell, Logan, and Mitchell, of the superior court; also the names of Nathaniel Boyden and Oliver H. Dockery, members-elect of Congress.

Now, I will state with regard to these State officers elected in North Carolina, that only one of them ever held any office in the rebel army. He was for a short time a captain, and only for a short time. The other gentlemen, whose names are included, incurred disabilities by reason of holding some State office. Mr. Boyden was a member of the Legislature of North Carolina during the war. He took no part in the war, and was known in his region of the State as a loyal man who opposed the war from first to last.

Mr. SPALDING. He lived at Salisbury.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. He lived at Salisbury, and was well known by all our prisoners there who knew anything of him to be in sympathy with the Union Army. He was known while a member of the Legislature as the author of what was called the Boyden personal liberty bill—so I think they styled it—which provided that any man conscripted into the rebel army should have the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. One of the rebel officers threatened to break up the Legislature and prevent the passage of that bill. He incurred disability by reason of his being a member of the Legislature, and by no other act. He held no other office by which he was disabled. Mr. Dockery, another member-elect of Congress, incurred disability in a similar manner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have one other remark to make in regard to the State officers. By the constitution of North Carolina, which is now before the House, it is provided that the offices of the existing provisional State government shall be vacated within ten days after Congress shall have approved their constitution. They will have no State officers, therefore, after we shall have approved their State constitution and admitted them to representation, except the officers elected under that constitution. The officers whose names are in this bill cannot take the oath of office under that State constitution unless these disabilities are removed, and the State will therefore be left without officers to carry on the government unless a bill of this kind is passed.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to ask the gentleman, in order to test the impartiality of this bill, whether any of the persons named in this bill, from whom disabilities are removed, have been known to act recently with any other than the Republican party?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir; the gentleman of whom I have just spoken, Mr. Boyden, from the Salisbury district, was elected to Congress on what was called the Conservative ticket; he ran against the Republican candidate for Congress.

Mr. BOYER. Can the gentleman name any other?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, I do not know whether I can. I cannot tell whether A or B is with the Republican party, or any other party. I will say to the gentleman that the committee have not examined the names with reference to ascertaining with which party the men act.

Mr. BOYER. Can the gentleman inform the House how many names there are altogether included in the bill?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think about two hundred. I am not certain; there may be more or less.

Mr. ROBINSON. As the gentleman is answering questions, I would inquire whether all the members-elect of Congress from North Carolina who require this absolution receive it in this bill?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think the other members-elect of Congress from that State do not require it; they are not subjected to any disability.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Boyden is a member-elect, and it is understood that he would require some absolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is understood that he is laboring under this disability, and so is Mr. Dockery, who was elected to Congress on what was known as the Republican ticket.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have another question to ask. Does this bill apply to all who need absolution?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. This bill, as I understand it, embraces all the members-elect of Congress from the State who require that disabilities should be removed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Who are elected to Congress?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. All who are elected to Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON. You understand that?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. That being satisfactory, I will ask another question. The gentleman from Illinois has again and again said that these names are recommended for this purpose by the convention of North Carolina. Is the House to understand from him that it was a unanimous recommendation? How was that recommendation expressed, in what mode, and was it unanimous?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the gentleman had attended to the reading of the report and resolution from that convention he would have had no need to ask the question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been trying to attend. The gentleman can answer the question without referring to the report.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that it was unanimous; at least it does not appear that there were any votes against it. The resolution adopted by the convention was sent here to the House of Representatives with the list of names recommended.

Mr. HARDING. I would inquire whether any of the names on this list were formerly on the rolls of the Army or Navy of the United States?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think not any. I am not sure, but I think there is not a name upon this list that was formerly on the rolls of the Army or Navy.

This bill applies only to North Carolina. There are a good many names in the bill, because there are a few names from each county in the State. The different delegates in the constitutional convention handed in to the committee appointed to investigate this matter the names of such persons in their respective counties and districts as they felt sure were in hearty accord with the measures of Congress and were loyal men and deserved to have the disability removed. Those names were all referred to the committee appointed by the convention and reported upon, and the convention adopted a resolution recommending them for relief from disability.

Mr. ROBINSON. Have you the yeas and nays on that resolution?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. Have you any record of the number of votes for and against it?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is not customary when State conventions or Legislatures send resolutions to Congress to accompany them with a copy of the journal showing the yeas and nays upon their adoption.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would make all the difference in the world if this list came here unanimously. There is another question. I find that this bill provides in the beginning that we shall absolve these men from the difficulties they have got into, the proposed fourteenth amendment of the Constitution notwithstanding. Can that be entertained? Is that constitutional? Are you going to sweep away everything for these privileged few, even the amendment to the Constitution, which is not yet adopted, and which you are trying to adopt by the votes of these States?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not suppose the House desires to discuss this question any further. This report is made unanimously, I believe, by the Committee on Reconstruction, without a dissenting voice.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I wish to say that I was not present at the session of the Reconstruction Committee when this long list of pardons was presented; but, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor of the general principle of pardon to all persons, whether they belong to my political school or not, and the only possible objection I could have to this bill would be that it selects men of one particular school of politics for pardon and omits all others, with one honorable exception, that of Mr. Boyden, member-elect of Congress, who, I see—and I hope the editor is misinformed—is claimed by the official organ of the gentleman's party as likely in all probability to vote with that party. It appears, therefore, that in a list of over two hundred names of those who are likely to be pardoned there is scarcely one doubtful Democrat included; while all of the other one hundred and ninety-nine belong to the political party to which the gentleman belongs. I am sorry to see this merciful feeling of pardon limited by political affiliations and associations. I hope that in due time—while I will vote for this bill—the heart and mind and judgment of honorable gentlemen upon the other side will at least be so enlarged as to be prepared to vote for a general amnesty.

While I am permitted to say, also, to the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that, so far as I am able to judge from the list of persons whose names are submitted here for pardon, especially the State officers, from the Governor-elect down, they were leaders of the rebellion during the late war, more or less efficient throughout. I am gratified to see that so far as they at least are concerned this principle of pardon is extended, while it does not bestow a very high encomium upon the Union party of North Carolina that they have been obliged to resort to those who, if they were not rebels in arms, were rebels in council, even worse rebels than those in arms, often inspiring those who were in arms by providing for them the sinews of war. I say it is not very creditable to the Unionists of North Carolina that they have been obliged to elect as their State officers those who were prominent in the rebellion. And it is now necessary, in order that the State government shall be organized at all under the test-oaths and laws of the United States, to resort in the first instance to the two Houses of Congress for pardon.

I repeat, however, that I do not object to this. I do not wish to be understood as in any degree opposing the pardon of almost any person who presents himself here as willing to take the oath of fidelity to the Constitution of the United States. Once more I say do not let the principle of pardon here established be confined to a particular party. I claim to ignore party in this matter, and acknowledge all who promise to be faithful to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BECK. Will my colleague on the committee [Mr. FARNSWORTH] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I desire to state my position in regard to this bill. I declined to vote against it in the Committee on Reconstruction, saying that I would make no factious opposition to it, for I desired to see disabilities removed from all persons. But I declined to vote for it; I simply acquiesced in it, because, as I said on the floor of this House when this bill was up before, these men have already been pardoned. And admitting the right here to remove disabilities was admitting the right to impose them, which I do not at all admit. Nor do I believe in the principle of removing disabilities from men simply because they have joined a certain political organization. Now, while I entertain these views, I make no objection to the reporting of this bill. I did not vote against it in committee, and it is now before the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman will allow it to be read.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Not at present. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] a member of the Committee on Reconstruction. As I understand him, he complains that in reporting this bill the committee have provided for relieving only those who are acting with a particular political party. Sir, the committee have acted upon all the names that have been sent to them from North Carolina. It is not the fault of the committee, it is not the fault of the Republican party, if other men do not send up their names and ask for pardon. It is not the fault of the Reconstruction Committee or of the Republican party if the Democrats in North Carolina are all rebels. If there are none in North Carolina except Republicans who are fit and proper persons to receive this absolution that is not the fault of the Republican party. It is the fault of the men themselves that they do not repent. If they will still continue to act as rebels, of course they cannot expect that Congress will interpose in their behalf, and relieve them from their disabilities. They cannot expect the Committee on Reconstruction or the majority of this House to vote to relieve them from their disabilities if they are still acting in accord with the rebel element in the South and not with the loyal element of the nation. The fault, then, lies there, and not with us. We have acted, as I said before, upon all the names that have been sent us by the convention and the names that have been presented to us by the delegation from North Carolina, now in this city.

Mr. NIBLACK. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] I desire to ask him one question. Does he regard the support of the reconstruction measures of Congress as a test of loyalty anywhere or everywhere?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I regard it as necessary that a man who acted with the rebels during the war shall give some evidence of repentance; and it is a very good evidence of repentance when he gives the reconstruction measures of Congress his cordial support. If he cooperates with the loyal people of his State, black and white, and helps in good faith and heartily to reconstruct and restore his State upon the basis of liberty and equality, he gives evidence of returning loyalty and repentance. If the gentleman can point out to me any better evidence than that I shall be willing to consider it; but without some evidence of repentance and loyalty we are not willing that these men shall be washed and made clean.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODWARD. Does the gentleman consider opposition to negro suffrage evidence that a man is a rebel? I would like an answer to that question. I understand the gentleman to argue that these men must give evidence that they are no longer rebels before they can be admitted to political privileges. He regards it as necessary, if I understand him correctly, that they shall support the measures of Congress looking to negro suffrage. Now, I ask the gentleman whether all the men in the United States who are opposed to negro suffrage are to be denounced on this floor as rebels by the gentleman or anybody else.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have not denounced as a rebel every man who is opposed to negro suffrage, either North or South; but if we find that all rebels oppose negro suffrage, it casts a little suspicion upon men who oppose it, whether you call them rebels or not. We do find in the South that all rebels oppose negro suffrage, and we also find there that all loyal men, generally speaking, are in favor of negro suffrage. I have not, however, argued here—the gentleman is the first to broach that point—that it is necessary that a man, to be loyal, should be in favor of negro suffrage. But, as I said a moment ago, we require that a man should give some kind of evidence of loyalty or repentance before we wash him and make him clean; and support of the reconstruction measures of Congress we regard as furnishing such evidence, and until gentlemen can point out some better evidence we consider it as pretty good evidence.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the gentleman would be in favor of my amendment; and I trust he will allow me to read it.

Mr. WOODWARD. The gentleman from Illinois will, I trust, allow me a word further. I understood the gentleman to assert, with great distinctness, that the evidence of repentance for which we must look on the part of southern rebels is their support of the reconstruction measures of Congress. I need not tell so intelligent a gentleman as the gentleman from Illinois that the reconstruction measures of Congress are founded entirely upon negro suffrage; nay, that is the sole intent and purpose of those measures. I ask the gentleman, then, whether it is not a fair sequence from his argument that every man in the South who is opposed to negro suffrage is to be considered as a rebel. If that be so, then I want to know whether every man in Michigan who is opposed to negro suffrage is a rebel; I want to know whether every man in Maine, in New Hampshire, in Connecticut, in Illinois, in Ohio, who is opposed to negro suffrage, is a rebel. I want an explanation of the astounding fact that while the people of these northern States record their solemn decision, State after State, against negro suffrage, they yet send into this House Representatives who stand up here and make the support of negro suffrage the test of loyalty. What business have the Representatives of those States to come here and set up such a test of loyalty as that when their constituents are at home deciding that negro suffrage is not a thing fit for American constitutions?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must resume the floor. The gentleman is not discussing this subject. He has set up a man of straw which he is striking at. I have not argued that negro suffrage is the best test of loyalty in the South, nor touching negro suffrage as the best evidence of a return to loyalty, or of repentance. What I have said, and I will repeat it, is that in the reconstruction of these States, the basis of loyalty, of liberty and equality, of right is a good evidence of repentance. I do not say that we require a man should be in favor of negro suffrage.

The gentleman says that the reconstruction measures are based wholly and entirely upon negro suffrage. They are based, as I understand, upon the loyalty of the people, upon the equal rights of the people, upon the rights of all men who are not guilty of crime, upon their equal right to participate in the government of these States; and until gentlemen can point us to some evidence which is better than any evidence given to us of the loyalty of these men and of their repentance we will take such evidence as we have, to wit, that they are acting in hearty accord with the people of their State, whether black or white.

When the gentleman says he regards it as unfortunate that we are obliged to extend amnesty and relief from disabilities to all officers elected to carry on the State government there he is wrong in that. A number of officers did not require any resolution. Of those who did, as I have said before, only one of them was ever in the rebel army. The others incurred disabilities in the way I have related, not dreaming that by being members of the Legislature or judges they had incurred disability while their hearts were beating in sympathy and full unison with the loyal people of the North.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the House requires this should be discussed further, and I therefore call for the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman hear my amendment read?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no authority, as the organ of the committee, to accept any amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let it be read.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will recollect the gentleman's courtesy.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The bill requires a two-thirds vote, and I therefore demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 28, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Garfield, Getz, Gravely, Halsey, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Juckes, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Ladin, George V. So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

WHITEHALL AND PLATTSBURG RAILROAD.

Mr. SPALDING obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. GARFIELD, who asked unanimous consent to take up and put on its passage a bill to grant the right of way to the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company.

Mr. MÜNGEN. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. HARDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion the Chair desires to make an announcement that to-morrow it is possible that business may be transacted by the House. The Senate have adopted a resolution saying that they will notify the House at what time they desire the House again to appear at the bar of the Senate. They have also adopted a resolution that to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, the vote on impeachment shall be taken, but the Chair is informed that it is possible that order may be rescinded. The House has not received any official notification to appear at the bar of the Senate to-morrow. Therefore, if the House now adjourns, business will be resumed to-morrow until some notification is received from the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order. The Chair will state, however, that it might interrupt another resolution, that when the Senate is engaged in the trial with open doors the House shall be in attendance.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HARDING. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BURR: The petition of W. A. Green, Stilwell Silkwood, Henry F. Green, and David Green, for bounty.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of Rev. Arnold Damen, pastor of the Church of the Holy Family, Chicago, Illinois, for remission of duties upon a church organ.

Also, the petition of the officers of the United States Army of the department of the Cumberland, for extension of the act of March 2, 1867, &c.

By Mr. LYNCH: The petition of citizens of Portland, Maine, for breakwater at Richmond's Island.

By Mr. STOKES: The several petitions of John Wells and Sarah Livingston, for relief.

Also, the petitions of Margaret Riley and Elizabeth Smith, for pensions.

By Mr. TWICHELL: The petition of J. M. Patten, for renewal of patent.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of 206 citizens of Jamestown, New York, praying Congress to pass a law extending "impartial suffrage" throughout the United States, removing all distinctions and restrictions on account of property or color.

Also, resolutions adopted by the Republican electors of Salamanca, Cattaraugus county, New York, in relation to the rights of American citizens abroad.

By Mr. WELKER: The petition of the executive committee of the National Theological Institute and University, asking the grant of the use of lands of the Government situated at Arlington, Virginia, for the education of freedmen, under the direction of said institute, in the District of Columbia.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of George S. Williams and others, citizens of Kentucky, praying for the division of that State into two judicial districts.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana: The petition of 80 women of the District of Columbia, praying the extension of the elective franchise to them, accompanied by a bill to the same purpose.

Also, petitions from 99 citizens of Waterloo city, Indiana, and of 74 citizens of Henry, Marshall county, Illinois, to the same effect.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 12, 1868.

The following prayer was offered by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.:

O Thou great and incomprehensibly glorious Jehovah ruling in heaven, ruling on the earth, disposing of all the affairs and interests of angels and of men. In Thine august presence we desire to bow and worship this morning. We come to confess our sins, individual and national; to acknowledge our transgressions, social and civil; but in and through the name and the blood of the everlasting Son of God we ask pardon and pray for forgiveness and for the Divine power to be vouchsafed unto us. Men change, but Thou remainest the same forever more. Kingdoms and empires rise and fall, but the pillars of Thy throne are unmoved. Modes and measures fail, but Thy word, O Lord God, is settled forever in heaven. We invoke the Divine presence especially to-day to be in this high Council Chamber. Prepare, O Lord, the mind of the President for the removal of the suspense connected with this day's proceeding. Prepare the minds of the people for the momentous issues which hang upon the decisions of the hour. Prepare the minds of Thy servants, the Senators, for the great responsibilities of this hour. May they be wise in council; may they be clear and just and correct in judgment; and may they be faithful to the high trusts committed to them by the nation. And may the blessing of God be upon all the people. Everywhere may the people bow to the supremacy of law. May order and quiet and peace prevail throughout all our borders. And may the blessing of God rest upon the nation. God preserve the people; God preserve the Government and save it; God maintain the right, to-day and ever more! Amen.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at eight minutes to twelve o'clock.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Until when?

Mr. DRAKE. To-morrow, of course.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senate will not adjourn. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, McCree, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conkling, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Fowler, Howard, and Wade—3.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. YATES. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me some of the Senators are very desirous of pushing this session into September or perhaps November. There is a great deal of business upon the table that we can just as well transact to-day as we can at any future time, and every day we sit now shortens the session by one day, and every day we adjourn over now prolongs it two or three.

Mr. RAMSEY. Well, we gain at this end. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish simply to make a remark in support of my friend from Rhode Island. Next week we probably shall have to take the usual adjournment to have the changes made for the summer in this room, and we might as well dispose of a good deal of business that lies upon our table, not of very great importance, but which might as well be disposed of before that ordinary recess. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will discharge what business it can during this week. We can take the vote on Saturday in the case that has been tried before us; and probably early next week we shall be compelled, in pursuance of the usual custom of the Senate, to take a recess of a few days at least, probably ten days, to enable this room to be put in order for the summer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to concur in the suggestions made by the two Senators who have spoken, and to add that the reason for not considering legislative business during the trial has substantially passed. We have heard the arguments and all the evidence, and it is to be presumed now that Senators have made up their minds, and there is no inconvenience in going on with legislative business. We have four or five days of this week which it is worse than folly in my judgment to waste, and the wasting of which will result in keeping us here during the hot days of July perhaps, possibly of August. I wish very earnestly to say that I think we ought to go on with business.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the very desire to have business transacted by the Senate under circumstances favorable to its transaction led me to make the motion that I did, to adjourn until to-morrow. It is perfectly manifest to me that no business can be properly done in the Senate this day.

Mr. SUMNER. Nor this week.

Mr. DRAKE. I am opposed to the motion of the Senator from Illinois. I think we ought to go at business just as soon as it can be done in the proper manner; that is, with the Senate in a proper condition to do business. I hope, sir, that the motion of the Senator from Illinois will not prevail, and that then the Senate will see fit to adjourn till to-morrow, by which time we shall probably be in a good trim to go at business again.

Mr. SHERMAN, and others. What is the matter?

Mr. DRAKE. Gentlemen ask me what is the matter. If there is no consciousness on the part of Senators of the condition of things in the Senate this day that should lead them to feel that the mind was not exactly in the balance that it ought to be for business I cannot impart that consciousness to them. [Laughter.] But, sir, when this nation is moved to its uttermost extremity by the expected events of this day, I should like to know whether the Senate is composed of men so entirely imbued with cool and calm philosophy that they partake not of the feeling that so moves it. If Senators are so imbued, all I have to say is that I am in a condition of great envy at their superior composure and philosophy.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask my friend from Missouri if he expects to get over this trouble by to-morrow.

Mr. DRAKE. Yes, sir; sleeping over it one night will cool it all down.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am surprised at the Senator from Missouri being disturbed by the proceedings of this day. This has been the most quiet, harmless day I have seen since the commencement of this trial. We heard eminent counsel discuss grave questions before us; we examined witnesses with composure; we heard opinions expressed by each other with composure; we met to-day, and to the disappointment of the galleries, on account of the sickness of one of our own members, we adjourned over the trial until Saturday. Certainly the excitement of to-day ought not to disturb the nerves of even my friend from Missouri. The Senate appears calm and quiet.

I have no doubt we can receive petitions and memorials from the people of the United States, present bills and resolutions, and probably hear speeches if any one desires to make a speech when he is so much disturbed as he is to-day. We may go on with our ordinary business. Amid the great events that are going on we must still discharge our duties. Whatever may be the result of this trial we still have the work of legislation for a great country to examine and to perfect, and I am sure our nerves are not in such condition to-day that we cannot go on with the simplest portion of that work, preparing business for the future.

Mr. DRAKE. That is so with the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I will state why I made this motion. I did not believe that during the pendency of this great trial there would be a disposition even to legislate; and that very suspense or anxiety which prevails throughout the land, referred to by the Senator from Missouri, comes up to us; it will mingle with us in our deliberations; and I do not believe that any wholesome legislation will take place while this suspense exists. The minds of Senators must be turned to that great question; it is the only question to which they can give their attention until it is finally decided. And, sir, for the purpose of giving that continued deliberation, that we may examine thoroughly and fully all the articles of impeachment, all the arguments of counsel on both sides, and weigh in our own minds the testimony fully, I think it is important that until the final decision takes place the Senate should adjourn. It is no use for Senators to tell me that we can legislate under existing circumstances. I am as desirous as any Senator that the business of the session should proceed; there are matters of vast importance before the Senate; but until this question is settled we cannot proceed deliberately and calmly with the investigation of those important matters. For this reason I have made the motion to adjourn over, and I believe it is a proper motion, and that we had better be delayed two days after the trial than to miss these two important days before the close of the trial.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am sorry that some of the gentlemen are in such a perturbed state of mind that they cannot proceed with the ordinary business of the Senate. If that be the condition of some of us to-day before the final judgment in this great cause is taken, after that final judgment is rendered and pronounced they may be much more perturbed, in a worse state of mind to proceed with business than now. It may be my condition, or it may be the condition of others. Amid storms and earthquakes and all the throes of nature we have to proceed in the ordinary duties of life, and of official as well as private life. One of these ordinary duties of official life is to attend to the ordinary business of the Senate; and without regard to present disappointments or present hopes and fears or of a greater perturbation of mind that may be produced with some of us—myself probably or others—by the event that is anticipated to take place on next Saturday, I think we might as well proceed in the best state of composure that we can possibly command to the ordinary legislation of Congress.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn. There can be no debate about that. I make the motion so that we may get time to calm our nerves. Mine are not unsteady; they are as calm as they ever were; but I think it is very well to adjourn for to-day, and to-morrow, if we come here not prepared to go on with business, we can adjourn again. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting that motion the Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives.
40TH CONG. 2D SESS.—No. 152.

tives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 475) to extend the charter of Washington city; also, to regulate the selection of officers, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 420) to incorporate the Connecticut Avenue and Park Railway Company, in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress;

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 254) for the protection of American interests in the Gulf of St. Lawrence; and

A concurrent resolution for an adjournment of the two Houses of Congress from Saturday, the 16th instant, until the 26th instant.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I will ask my friend from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion for an adjournment, with a view of asking the Senate to take up the bill in relation to the extension of the charter of the city of Washington. Senators will remember that the charter expires on the 15th day of this month, and it is therefore important that that bill should be acted on now.

Mr. CAMERON. I withdraw my motion for the moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then recurs on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] that when the Senate adjourn, to-day it be to meet on Friday next.

Mr. CONNESS. I move for the present to lay that on the table. It can be taken up again.

Mr. SUMNER. Let it be laid aside informally.

Mr. YATES. I withdraw the motion for the present.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. HARLAN. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill I have mentioned.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] desires to have certain bills referred; and after that I, for one, object to proceeding with ordinary business to-day. We did not come here for that purpose. I am sure that very few feel like it, and it would be better I think to adjourn until to-morrow. If to-morrow the Senate does not feel like going on with business it can adjourn over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will ask my friend from Iowa to allow me to have the bill from the House providing for the deficiency in the appropriations for the reconstruction of the rebel States to be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, so that it can be acted upon at the earliest possible day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to lay all these bills before the Senate before the adjournment, if there is no objection. ["Agreed."]

The following bills and joint resolutions, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 420) to incorporate the Connecticut Avenue and Park railway, in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868—to the Committee on Appropriations.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 254) for the protection of American interests in the Gulf of St. Lawrence was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well.

Mr. CONNESS. Is the object to indefinitely postpone it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

The bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that that bill lie on the table for the present. I desire to have it printed and acted on to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that it be printed now.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives providing for a recess from Saturday, the 16th instant, to Monday, the 25th instant.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting the documents received by him from the conventions held under the reconstruction acts in the States of South Carolina and Arkansas.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that those papers lie on the table and be printed; it will be necessary to have them in the consideration of the Arkansas bill.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg leave to present the petition of Edwin M. Chaffee, of Providence, setting forth that in 1836 a patent was issued to him for an important improvement in the manufacture of India rubber, reducing the raw material to a condition to be manufactured without the use of solvents, and that while a great many men have grown rich from the business he has never received an adequate compensation therefor; and he prays for the passage of an act authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to hear his application for an extension of his letters-patent, and to grant the same if it shall be deemed just and reasonable. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON CITY CHARTER.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 475) to extend the charter of Washington city; also to regulate the selection of officers, and for other purposes.

The first amendment was in section two, to strike out "the first month after the passage of this act" and insert "July, 1868."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to add to the fifth section the words "unless by order of the board."

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know from the honorable member from Iowa what is the operation of that last amendment?

Mr. HARLAN. I have not heard the amendment read, I will say to my friend from Maryland. It might be well for the Secretary to read it in connection with the text of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that should be done.

The fifth section of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That when the mayor, board of aldermen, and common council shall be assembled in joint convention, as provided for in this act, they shall by a majority vote designate a bank in which the various monies of the city of Washington shall be deposited; and they shall make such regulations in relation to the mode in which such funds shall be kept and paid out as shall be deemed advisable for the interests of the city; and within five days after such designation a certificate of the bank selected shall be made out and placed in the hands of the president or cashier thereof, and thereafter it shall not be lawful to retain or deposit the funds of the city, or any part thereof, in any other bank or place.

The amendment was to add to the section the words "unless by order of the board."

Mr. SUMNER. That is a very proper amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The last amendment was to add to the bill the following additional section:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," passed January 8, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to require electors in the city of Washington to reside in the ward or election precinct in which they shall offer to vote fifteen days prior to the day of any election, instead of three months: Provided, That said section shall not be construed as conferring the elective franchise in said city on non-commissioned officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines, in the regular service of the United States, stationed or on duty in said city, except such as may have become actual residents with their families in said city for one year previous to any election: And provided further, That no person claiming to be a naturalized citizen shall be registered as an elector, nor shall the name of any such person be retained on the list of voters without the production of his naturalization papers or duly certified copies thereof or satisfactory proof of the loss of the same; and for the purpose of correcting said list as regards the aforesaid classes of persons and in all other respects the judges of election shall meet in some proper place in said city between the hours of nine o'clock a. m. and seven o'clock p. m., on three days instead of two days as now required: And provided further, That all the original lists of voters, both before and after their correction, shall remain in the custody of the member of the board of judges first named in their appointment by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and, in the event of his removal or resignation, in the custody of his regularly appointed successor, except when being copied for publication and for the use of the Commissioners of Election, and said original lists shall at all times be open for the use and inspection of either of said judges: And provided further, That no property qualification shall be required for any of the offices of said city, and that three days prior to any election each board of commissioners of election shall appoint two clerks to assist them in registering the names of voters in their respective election precincts, and in making returns of the elections, who shall be sworn before the clerk of the supreme court of said District, truly and faithfully to perform their duties, and for any misconduct in office be subject to the same penalties to which said commissioners are now subject: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the judges of election to make any regulation and give any notice which may be proper or necessary to carry out any of the provisions of this section.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the District Committee whether I am right in my impressions on hearing that section read, whether the amendment of the House provides for a reduction of the residence in the ward or election district from three months to fifteen days?

Mr. HARLAN. It does.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know the origin of that amendment; but I undertake to say that under that provision a party having in a city a majority vote, taking the whole number of wards or districts together, may so equalize it as to carry the election in the entire city without any reference to the residents in the districts or wards at all; that temporary residences can be obtained and taken and had in districts for fifteen days in such a manner as to entirely put the vote of the permanent residents of that district at the mercy of what are called in common parlance colonizers. As I have said, I do not know what the origin of this amendment is; but I undertake to say that it is not to promote legal voting, nor the interests of the permanent residents of a city.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I suppose the object of the House in proposing this amendment will be manifest to every Senator. The election occurs in this city under existing laws on the 1st of June, and it is known to every one that a large per cent. of the population of every city change their residence in the spring or beginning of the summer months, and as the law now stands they will have to reside in their new homes three full months before they can vote, although they may have resided in the city a full year or for ten years for that matter; and it is to enable these persons that change their residence in the city from one part of the city to another, who otherwise are legal voters, to cast their votes at the regular election. There may be some objections to it; but there are certainly very serious objections to the disfranchisement of so many citizens as usually change their place of residence at the beginning of the summer months.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not think there is a provision in the election laws applicable to any State of the Union where the residence required is less than thirty days in the district, either in city or country; and the object of these provisions is clearly to prevent the manipulation of voters and the transfer of them fraudulently from district to district. Now, sir, I am in favor of keeping up to some extent the morale of our elections, and I ask of the Chair whether an amendment is in order to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is susceptible of amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I move, then, an amendment, to substitute thirty days for fifteen days.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not know that this amendment of the House of Representatives is so bad to this bill after all. I think that the fifth section of the bill as it passed the Senate is intended to favor some particular bank. It is a regulation by which some particular banking institution shall get the use of the funds of the corporation by the election of some board, instead of leaving the treasurer of the city to make his deposits wherever he thinks it may be safe to make them. The amendment of the House is simply to provide for the carrying of an election. As the voters now are in the District, I suppose there is some uneasiness as to the result of the election in June, as I understand from the Senator from Iowa it is to come off in June. Fearing that that election may not be satisfactory a proposition is made now, right upon the eve of the election, to change the election law, and to change it in a very important particular—not to make the integrity of the election more secure, but to make it more uncertain; to reduce the time of residence in the precinct from three months to fifteen days, so as to make it quite impossible that the people residing in the District shall know those who come here to vote. If we want fair elections in the District of Columbia certainly this amendment ought not to prevail, in my judgment. It is not consistent with the legislation which the experience of the States has proven to be necessary. I do not believe in this special legislation with a view to particular elections, nor this special legislation with a view to particular banks.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I entirely concur with the honorable member from California as to the impolicy and the injustice of the amendment. It will, or to speak with perfect accuracy it may, certainly be used for a fraudulent purpose. This city now contains a population of several thousand colored men who are voters. I do not know in what particular wards they are now living, but of course they are living in some ward. It may be the object to carry all the wards, because it may be desirable not only to elect a mayor who may be approved of by the aggregate number of votes, but to elect a common council; and if that is the case, all that will be necessary to do, if the amendment of the House becomes a part of the law, will be to take those colored people into the wards which are desired to be carried, and then for two weeks pay their board. How are the judges to ascertain that the movement is not a colorable one for the purpose of effecting a favorable result at the election?

Such a provision is not to be found in any of the cities with whose election laws I am acquainted; a much longer time than fifteen days is provided. It is not to be found in any of the States with reference to the counties into which they may be divided. There the residence required is generally six months. The object of making the term of residence a comparatively long one is to secure against frauds in the management of the election. It may be true that some might be disfranchised if a residence of three months is required, as far as the election in the particular ward is concerned; but the man is not disfranchised in the choice of a mayor; or if he were, it is much more important, I think, to the interest of good government that a few men should be disfranchised by their own act of moving from ward to ward or from county to county than that a law should pass which would enable those who desired to manipulate the election for their own purposes to perpetrate a fraud upon the election system. I shall vote, therefore, for the amendment suggested by the honorable member from California, to increase the period of residence to thirty days.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, the only objection to this amendment that suggests itself to my mind is the necessity that would follow of returning the bill to the House of Representatives for their concurrence in our amendment to their amendment. That probably could be done if the House should not adjourn over.

Mr. JOHNSON. That can be done tomorrow.

Mr. HARLAN. Thirty days, perhaps, would not be too long if the question was an original question presented to the Senate. I will observe, however, in relation to the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, that I think it is hardly fair to impute an improper motive to the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not say so.

Mr. HARLAN. I understood the Senator to say that it might have been the purpose of the authors of this amendment—

Mr. JOHNSON. If I did, I did not mean it. What I meant to say was that the law might be so used—not that the law was passed for the purpose of being so used. I never cast reflections on the House, or upon any member of either branch, designedly.

Mr. HARLAN. I know the Senator would not do so, and hence I called his attention to the phraseology he used.

I would make this additional remark, that if the result should follow which the Senator suggests, that by the removal from ward to ward a council or a board of aldermen should be elected a majority of whom would be in favor of the views of a majority of the inhabitants of the city, it would be more in accordance with my ideas of correct government than to have the law so framed as to enable a minority of the inhabitants of the city to control the board of aldermen or the board of councilmen. I therefore cannot agree with him in that reason suggested by him for agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. I will not individually vote for the Senator's amendment; but if it should be the judgment of the Senate that it would be proper to extend the time to thirty days instead of fifteen days I shall not oppose it.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I must say that I doubt seriously the expediency of the Senate undertaking to amend the amendment of the House. I believe that that amendment is substantially according to the practice in other places and also according to the suggestions of good policy.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him what the rule in the city of Boston is under the laws of Massachusetts in reference to the residence of voters?

Mr. SUMNER. I wish I were able to answer the Senator accurately on that head.

Mr. CONNESS. I can answer the Senator as to my State.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not so well informed, perhaps, in regard to Massachusetts as the Senator is in regard to California.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, Mr. President, I am sorry to hear it.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish I were better informed in regard to Massachusetts. But I understand that in most of the considerable towns the requirement is of ten or fifteen days in a ward, at least I am so told by those who ought to know. Whether that is the requirement in Massachusetts I am not able to say. But it seems to me that we here in Washington ought to have the least requirement which is found in any State, and for this reason: Washington is composed, more than any other considerable town, of boarding-houses; people live for a short time in one place and then move to another; they may be one month in one ward and another month in another ward. I think that your legislation ought to take that into consideration; it ought to provide for that peculiarity of this place and allow persons who do change their residence—it may be month by month, or from three months to three months—to vote where they find themselves on the day of election, provided they have been there a reasonable number of days before. It seems to me the requirement of the House of Representatives is reasonable. I should like to appeal to the Senator from California under the circumstances to withdraw his proposition and not press it to a vote. I perceive, however, that he does not hear me.

Mr. CONNESS. I do.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CONNESS. I always hear the Senator when he speaks.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that it is hardly worth while on this account to send this bill back again to the House of Representatives. It has made one journey there, and now another journey to the Senate. Why send it back to the House, with the chance that perhaps they will reject our amendment to their amendment, and thus interpose another delay?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether that is a usual argument where the House attaches an amendment containing an original proposition in no way connected with the bill that the Senate considered and passed?

Mr. SUMNER. Sometimes it is and sometimes it is not. On some bills it is an excellent argument, and on other bills it is a very poor argument. With the present bill I consider it an excellent argument.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then it depends, I understand, altogether on the purpose which somebody wants to accomplish.

Mr. SUMNER. Not precisely that; it depends upon the measure. Now, I think, all things considered, it is better that this measure should be acted upon at once and brought to a conclusion, without any more amendments, without any more journeys between the two ends of the Capitol.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I have but a word to say, and that is in answer to the question the Senator from California put to the Senator from Massachusetts as to the custom in other cities. I have just been informed by a gentleman from the West that the custom in the cities of the West is to require a less time than fifteen days—ten days.

Mr. SUMNER. Even ten days.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Even ten days, and I believe that in some of the eastern cities persons are only required to live in a ward four or five days, or time sufficient to register their names, instead of ten or fifteen days. I think the custom is to have a less time than that named in this case, and it would hardly be worth while to delay the bill by making this amendment.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I have risen to say that the time in Pennsylvania is ten days. We find it ample, and I can see no reason why there should be more in this town than in the towns of Pennsylvania.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not quite positive as to what the practice is in the city in which I reside; but my strong impression is that a person living in the city, having his residence there, may register his name at any time before the registry is closed, and change it from one ward to another if he wishes a change of residence. The object is simply to inform those who receive the votes that he has a right to vote in the particular ward by finding his name on the list; and I believe that the practice is, even if he changes his residence before the time when he gives his vote, if his name has been entered on the list in a particular ward, he may vote there. I do not think any time is required except enough to make certainty as to the fact.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not entirely concur in these statements. In cities the rule, I think, will be found to be like this: first, it is necessary to divide the wards into many voting districts. In the city of New York there are ten or more districts in a ward, twelve or fifteen, as the case may be. The residence required in the county is an extended residence for a vote; in a ward a lesser amount of time; and in a sub-district of a ward still less; the rule being kept up for the purpose of preventing the system now commonly known as colonizing votes.

But my object, Mr. President, was not to delay the passage of this bill, nor to impute any such purpose as may be carried out perhaps under it; and it is not often, I believe, that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who appears to feel great interest in this bill and regards it as a special case, makes an appeal such as he has made to me, and when he has made it, I believe, I have never refused. So I will, at his instance, withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I renew the amendment of the Senator from California, and I desire to make a remark upon it. In the first place, in the present stage of this bill, it can be returned to the House of Representatives and acted upon finally to-day without any difficulty. In the next place, a word as to the point made by the Senator from Iowa that an election is to be held early in the month of June. Why, sir, a limitation of thirty days before that time would allow the ordinary spring changes of residence; and therefore that argument would not apply to a limitation of thirty days, although it might have some force in regard to the original limitation of three months.

In our States ordinarily there is a long period of time required for residence in the State for citizenship in the State, and then, beside that, a residence in the election district. I do not know how it may be under the election laws of the District of Columbia; but if this three months' residence is all that is required in the District, if there is no longer period of time required of an elector to be an inhabitant and a citizen of the District of Columbia, we ought to be very careful in reference to what provision we make in this particular.

Mr. HARLAN. I will say to the Senator that I think the law now fixes the time of residence in the city at one year.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is a reasonable provision as to that. Now, to change the present rule from three months down to thirty days, I think is but a reasonable proposition, one to which we ought to accede, because it accords with what has been done elsewhere in other sections of the country.

Mr. President, I venture to say that two thirds of all the frauds in our city elections arise from change of residence on the eve of elections, what is commonly called colonization. I am confident that in the city of Philadelphia two thirds of all the election frauds that are there committed are from this source; and enlightened by my observation and experience in other places I am strongly of opinion that this limitation of thirty days in reference to the right of voting in the District of Columbia is necessary to preserve the purity of elections in this District; and as it is a change from ninety days to thirty days, reducing the amount at present required two thirds, I think we ought to concur with such an amendment. I therefore renew the amendment of the Senator from California, and I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CORBETT. It seems to me that the necessity for a long residence in the election precinct where a man offers to vote is not so great in a community where there is a registry of the voters as in one where there is no registry. In this city there is a registration, and I think fifteen days' residence in the election precinct is enough to require. Fraudulent removals and false voting can be readily detected with a proper registry system. I see no good reason for changing this time from fifteen days to thirty days under the present law; there might have been some reason under the old law, when a registry of voters was not required.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Vickers, and Wiley—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Doolittle, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, and Morrill of Maine—8.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was concurred in.

Mr. CAMERON. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 12, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SPECIAL AGENTS OF THE POST OFFICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 19th of March, a list of special agents appointed, compensation received, those not receiving any compensation, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

RATIFICATION OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following letter from the General of the Army of the United States:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1868.

SIR: In compliance with resolution of the House of Representatives of May 11, 1868, I have the honor to submit the following statement of the number of votes cast for and against the constitutions of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Alabama, as reported by the several district commanders:

North Carolina—Votes for constitution, 92,590; against constitution, 71,820.
South Carolina—Votes for constitution, 70,758; against constitution, 27,238.
Georgia—Votes for constitution, 89,607; against constitution, 71,309.

Louisiana—Votes for constitution, 66,152; against constitution, 48,739.

Alabama—Votes for constitution, 69,807; against constitution, 1,065.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT, General.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. PAINE, the letter was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. CARY for ten days after to-day.

NEW YORK POST OFFICE.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, on the subject of the New York post office, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BROOKS. I suggest that that is not the proper reference.

The SPEAKER. It is presented by a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and he moves to refer it to that committee.

Mr. BROOKS. I have presented a memorial of the same kind exactly. As it is only for an appropriation I think it had better go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are considering the subject of the appropriation also.

Mr. FERRY. That subject is before the committee, and it is proper that the memorial should go to the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. Whichever committee has custody of the appropriation ought to have the memorial referred to it.

Mr. FERRY. It is true the Committee on Appropriations has the custody of the appropriation of money, but the question of the construction of the building and its location is for the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BROOKS. Is this a memorial in relation to construction? Mine was for an appropriation only.

Mr. FERRY. I do not know what the gentleman's memorial is about. The one I presented, I suppose, has reference to the question of the propriety and necessity of construction and appropriation, and properly comes within the province of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I therefore asked that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. BROOKS. Suppose we withdraw both memorials for a moment and confer together.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that while the Committee on Appropriations have charge of general appropriations the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads could undoubtedly, when regularly called, report a specific appropriation for some specific object if they thought fit to do so.

Mr. BROOKS. The point of importance in this case is this: that the Committee on Appropriations has oftener an opportunity to report than the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and in annexing an appropriation like this to a general bill they are far more likely to secure its passage.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Allow me to suggest that the Committee on Appropriations only report bills appropriating money in pursuance of law. They cannot report an appropriation to build a post office in New York until Congress has passed a law authorizing the construction of the building.

Mr. BROOKS. Congress has passed a law to that effect.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No; there is no such law now.

Mr. BROOKS. They passed a law providing for the selection of a site.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, for a site; but that has been paid for.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object to the reference?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir; let both memorials go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that the memorial had better go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FERRY. I still insist upon the reference I asked, and when the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads consider and report upon the whole subject, then, if the gentleman sees fit, he can move to refer their report to the Committee on Appropriations, and take the sense of the House on that motion; but let the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads first examine the matter and report upon it.

Mr. BROOKS. Very well; let the memorial go to that committee.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

INTERNAL TAXATION.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the bill be recommitted and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I give notice that having, under the rules, the right to report the bill back at any time from the committee, I will bring it back into the House within, perhaps, a week from this time, if there should be no recess. If the House and the Senate determine upon a recess of a few days I shall ask the House to take this bill up, to be considered and acted upon, and shall report it back for that purpose immediately after the recess expires; it may be perhaps eight or ten days hence.

As the bill is one much sought for, it is perhaps appropriate that extra copies should be furnished for the use of members. I will move, therefore, that five thousand extra copies of the bill be printed, and I will ask in doing so, as the application is principally to the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, that one hundred of the copies be for the use of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion to print extra copies of the bill was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would ask my colleague if he will not indicate at this time to the House what his purpose is in regard to the discussion on the bill when it comes up; what time he proposes to allow for general discussion, so that members may make some calculation in regard to any general speeches on the bill they may wish to make.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to saying to the gentleman that it is not the purpose or desire of the committee to cut off unnecessarily discussion upon this bill. It is probable that some two, three, or more days may be allowed for general discussion; but after that we shall certainly ask that all debate be reduced to a mere business discussion, intending to afford the amplest opportunity for amendments and for debate upon the merits of the bill and all parts of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. SCHENCK. If we find, after some time has been occupied in debate, that it is likely to become almost interminable, to interfere with the transaction of other public business, to prolong the session, and to prevent the possibility of the bill getting through in reasonable time, it may become needful to put a stop to the debate. But we shall set out upon the discussion with the confident expectation that gentlemen upon either side will not abuse the opportunity offered them, but we shall have a fair, free, and liberal discussion of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will hear it.

Mr. KELLEY. I will suggest to the gentleman to ask for an increased number of copies of the tax bill for distribution. Judging by the number of applications in advance for this bill, I think there will be a demand, and a legitimate demand, very largely beyond five thousand copies.

Mr. SCHENCK. Having offered my resolution, as instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means, for five thousand copies, I suppose it has gone, under the law, to the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Printing will have the power to report back a larger or a smaller number, as they may think best. I suggest to the gentleman to wait until the Committee on Printing shall make their report, and in the meantime he can try to influence the committee, if he thinks it necessary and can do it.

WHISKY FOR ARMY HOSPITALS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask leave to report from the Committee of Ways and Means, for consideration at this time, a joint resolution upon the subject of disposing of some whisky on hand belonging to the Government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to report at any time for recommitment. But it will require unanimous consent to report any subject for action at this time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will ask that the resolution be read, and then I think there will be no objection to it.

The title of the joint resolution was as follows:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 262) authorizing certain distilled spirits to be turned over to the Surgeon General for the use of Army hospitals.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the Surgeon General of the Army all the distilled spirits produced during the experiments made by the late commission for testing meters for the internal revenue service, to be used for the Army hospitals, and to be paid for, at a reasonable cost, out of any money appropriated for the purchase of Army and hospital stores, the amount received to be applied toward the expenses of said commission.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was received and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SCHENCK. If any gentleman desires me to explain I will do so; if not, I will ask that the joint resolution be now put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF UNSERVICEABLE ORDNANCE, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask permission to report a joint resolution which has the concurrence of all the members of the Committee on Ordnance.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The title of the joint resolution was as follows:

A joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to sell damaged or unserviceable arms, ordnance, and ordnance stores.

The joint resolution was read at length. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be sold, in such manner and at such times and places, at public or private sale, as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest, the old cannon, arms, and other ordnance stores in possession of the War Department which are damaged or otherwise unsuitable for the United States military service, and to cause the net proceeds of such sales, after paying the proper expenses of sale and of transportation to the place of sale, to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CHANLER. I would inquire if there is any objection to having this property sold at public auction?

Mr. SCHENCK. The Secretary of War has now the right to sell at public auction, and has attempted to do so, but has received no bid.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to considering this joint resolution at this time?

Mr. ELIOT. Has the morning hour commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has not. This must first be disposed of, either by action upon it or by objecting to its reception.

Mr. ELIOT. I object to it, and call for the regular order of business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

IRON FOR THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back, with a substitute, House joint resolution No. 180, declaring the meaning of the act relating to the Pacific railroad.

The substitute, which was read, provides that all acts and parts of acts authorizing the construction of a railroad or railroads to the Pacific ocean directing the use of American iron in the construction and equipment of such roads shall be so construed as to make it necessary to use only American iron for all rails, chairs, fishbars, bolts, and spikes in the relaying and repairing of such roads as well as in the construction thereof.

Mr. PRICE. The only object of this bill is to remove a doubt in the minds of a great many whether the original act intended that in the relaying and repairing of the Pacific road American iron only should be used. This resolution simply declares that fact. That is all there is in it.

The substitute was adopted; and the resolution, as amended by the adoption of the substitute, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARGES ON PACIFIC RAILROAD, ETC.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) to regulate the tariff for freight and passengers on the Union and Central Pacific railroads and their branches.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney General of the United States be constituted a board of commissioners, whose duty it shall be, on the 1st day of July in each year, to establish a tariff for freight and passengers over the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads and their branches, which tariff shall be equitable and just and not exceeding double the average rates charged on the different lines of railroad between the Mississippi river and the Atlantic ocean, in latitudes north of St. Louis, Missouri; and it is declared unlawful for said railroad companies to charge any sum in excess of the rates so fixed and established.

The substitute, which was read, provides that for the purpose of carrying into effect the intent and meaning of section eighteen of the act of July, 1862, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney General of the United States be constituted and appointed a board of commissioners, whose duty it shall be, on the 1st of July in each year, to establish a tariff of prices for the transportation of freight and passengers on said Pacific railroads and branches, at which prices so established the said railroad company shall be compelled to transport the same; and the company is required to keep posted up in all their stations along the line of the road the bill of prices so established. It is provided, however, that this act shall not take effect until there shall be a continuous line of railroad completed and in running order from Omaha to Sacramento.

Mr. PRICE. This substitute is substantially the same as the joint resolution referred to the committee. It provides for a commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney General, to fix the tariff of prices, and a limitation is provided as to the rates which may be fixed. I have no disposition to make a speech.

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir.

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the proviso of the substitute is one calculated to retard rather than accelerate the completion of the road; for until the road is completed no regulation fixing the tariff for freight and passengers can take effect. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] the propriety of allowing the proviso to be stricken out, for it will postpone indefinitely the time when the resolution shall take effect. It will tend to discourage the prosecution, or at least the actual completion of the work, for by delaying that the time for regulating the tariff of charges may be indefinitely postponed. Will the gentleman yield for a motion to strike out the proviso?

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman is not probably aware that the eighteenth section of the original act under which this road has been constructed provides expressly that when the road shall be finished certain supervisory powers may be exercised by Congress with reference thereto. It was in consequence of that eighteenth section that the committee felt bound to insert this proviso, which we deemed necessary in view of that provision of the original act.

Mr. UPSON. I will suggest to the gentleman that there is a provision in the act authorizing Congress to amend, alter, or add to the act at its pleasure; therefore we are not bound by that provision unless we consider it good policy.

Mr. PRICE. It will be remembered that when this question was before the House heretofore, and was discussed at some considerable length, I proposed that this joint resolution should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I made that proposition because I thought then, as I think now, that a legal question of very great importance was involved in this very provision. After consulting the best lawyers they have been able to find the committee have been governed by their advice; and they have held, lawyers in the committee and lawyers out of the committee, that a resolution of this kind should embody a provision like this, so as to conform to and not be in conflict with the original act. These are the reasons which governed the committee in reporting the resolution as they have.

If there be no other questions to be asked, I shall demand the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. PRICE. I will hear the amendment read.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask leave to offer the following amendment:

And provided further, That the tariff of prices so fixed shall not exceed eight cents per mile per ton for freight and six cents per mile for passengers.

Mr. PRICE. I have no authority to admit of any such thing as that. I have reported the matter as I was instructed to do by the committee, appointing a commission to fix the prices.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will move the amendment and let the House decide on it. I think there should be a restriction upon this commission.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. When will this resolution take effect?

Mr. PRICE. Judging the future by the past, in about two years.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. And not until then?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. PRICE. I will yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust that this debate will not be limited. I trust that we will have time enough to discuss this matter. There is no such haste that this should be disposed of in an hour.

Mr. PRICE. I would yield longer to the gentleman, but there are several other gentlemen who wish to say something on this resolution. I will yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is it necessary only to give an hour to the discussion of this subject?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for five or six minutes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust this House will insist that we shall have more than an hour to discuss this question. I protest against this attempted mode of legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PRICE. I should prefer to get along with this matter quietly. I hope to get through with this in one hour; and I will yield to the gentleman from New York for ten minutes, if he wants them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will take what I can get, but I want more.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let him have fifteen minutes.

Mr. PRICE. I cannot yield for more than ten minutes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I must take ten minutes.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] has stated, Congress has reserved the right to change, alter, amend, or regulate. The chairman of the committee says that Congress has no power to interfere with this matter of the regulation of the tariff of prices for freight and passengers. This House will remember that after the law of 1862 this corporation came here and said that under the terms of that law they could not build the road; in other words, that Congress had not voted money enough. They asked Congress to recede, and it did. They gave them ten miles of land instead of five; and the loan from Government was made a second mortgage instead of the first. After all this it was then provided that Congress could alter, amend, or repeal without any limitation.

Let me say in the outset that it is sometimes claimed to be a hardship that these men have been compelled to put their hands into their pockets and take out their money to build this road. That is not so, and I will show it from the report of the company itself. The great benefits bestowed by the Government upon this company was upon the ground that the road was an expensive one and its building was opposed by great obstacles. If we consult the report of the company itself we will find that its construction has not been unreasonably expensive, and that the expense has mainly been met by the appropriations and subsidies from Congress.

The Government gave a subsidy of $16,000 per mile and nineteen or twenty million acres of land. Now, what do we see from the company's report? That a road eleven hundred miles in length, by their own report, is to be built, which will cost, with all their fabulous prices for construction, $82,000,000. That is the cost according to their report. And then they show what they have to build this road with. They have of United States bonds $29,000,000; of first mortgage bonds, $29,000,000; of capital stock paid in, $3,000,000; of land grants, fourteen million eight hundred thousand acres, which at $1 50 per acre amounts to $21,000,000—making in all $88,000,000.

Now, mark; they say the cost of eleven hundred miles is $82,000,000, and yet they have $88,000,000 to build it. So they will have $6,000,000 more in their treasury when the road is completed than they have resources to build it. Of that $88,000,000, $8,000,000 is money which they have put in their hands for building the road; so that when it is finished they will have paid out, according to their own figures, only $2,000,000 to build it.

But this road does not cost $82,000,000. These gentlemen have made contracts with themselves, whereby they pay double the amount to build the road than it ought to cost. They have contracted to build it for the first five hundred miles at $50,000 per mile; and the Government commissioners, who certainly are not unfriendly to these parties, in speaking of this matter, dated July 8, 1865, say:

"In October, 1864, when we assumed the duties of our appointment, we found that in the months of August and September previous a contract had been arranged and consummated by the executive committee, in which are vested the powers of the board when not in session, for the construction and equipment of the first one hundred miles of the road west of the Missouri river at the rate of $50,000 per mile payable $5,000 per mile in the stock of the company and the balance in the currency bonds of the Government and the securities of the company. From the first the contract price appeared to us to be very high. At present, with the probable decline in the cost of labor and materials and advance in the value of the Government bonds it seems extravagant."

Another commissioner reports on the 26th of August, 1865, that the balance of the five hundred miles could be built at a small cost compared with the rate at which the first one hundred miles were contracted. And yet $50,000 per mile has been paid for building the road which could not have cost over $25,000. The eastern division, a more expensive road, cost less than $30,000 to build it. The Atchison branch has cost less than that.

These men, then, do not go outside of their own corporation to make contracts. They have created a credit mobilier. They have created a ring inside of the corporation. Look. In 1864 there were one hundred and twenty-five stockholders in this Pacific railroad holding two thousand shares of stock. In January, 1866, there were one hundred and twenty-three stockholders, holding twenty-eight thousand shares of stock. In the report which these gentlemen were required to make they named the stockholders and the amount of stock held. In the last report the number of stockholders had dwindled down to fifty-three, and they do not state the number of shares they own. Only fifty-three stockholders, a year and a half ago, owning a road representing $100,000,000 of capital! It takes twenty of these stockholders to make a direction, so that you have thirty outside.

The company have made a report of their operations. They say that in eight months, with three hundred miles of road completed, after paying interest on their mortgage and Government bonds, they have left $500,000 to be put into their treasury. And now, when it is asked that the exorbitant rate of ten cents per mile for passengers and fifteen cents per ton per mile for freight shall be taken off that the people may have the benefit, they pitifully allude to the money they have expended!

Why, sir, do you believe for a moment that if a private company were building this road to the Pacific and this Congress had any power to interfere, even if the whole $50,000,000 had been expended by that private company in the construction of the road, this Congress would allow those men to charge ten cents per mile for transportation and fifteen cents per ton for freight? You talk about waiting until the road is completed. Why, it will then control this Congress, if it does not do it to-day. The line between this city and New York controls every State through which it passes. The Central railroad in New York controls that State and buys up its Legislature year after year, so as to increase its tariff on passengers. You ask us to wait until we get both our hands within the jaws of this lion, when we shall be powerless to control it. Sir, their report shows very conclusively that these men are making enormous sums of money out of their charge of ten cents per mile on way travel. Men living within forty miles of Omaha wagon their produce to market because they cannot afford to pay the charges on this railroad. That is true, sir.

Now, sir, I have only time enough left to protest against the previous question which limits debate to a few minutes, and against the wrong that is done the American people by the extortion of this railway company. The men who go in advance of civilization to make our plains fruitful are the men who are subjected to this extortion of ten cents a mile for transportation and fifteen cents a ton for freight. The men who go up into the mountains to dig out the hidden riches are the men from whom these extravagant charges are extorted.

Sir, they have demonstrated that the obstacles in the way of the construction of this road have passed away. The company is now drawing a triple subsidy of $96,000 a mile for building what was said to be the most "difficult and mountainous" part of the road. From the foot of the Black hills, which are claimed to be the base of the Rocky mountains, they run about forty-five miles and then strike the Laramie plain and run one hundred miles almost on a level, and on these one hundred and fifty miles they are receiving the triple subsidy. Under these circumstances we have a right to provide that the people shall be benefited, and not fifty-three stockholders, by a reduction of the rates for passengers and freight on this route.

Mr. PRICE. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BAILEY.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I was in hopes that the committee would report some substantial plan for regulating the tariff of charges upon these roads. I have no feeling nor wish in regard to the subject other than that Congress should assume its legitimate control over that question in regard to these roads. The resolution as reported strikes me as evading that duty. It is entirely unsubstantial. It postpones the whole matter, and leaves to a future contingency the matter of regulating these roads.

Now, sir, in my judgment it is very important that Congress should regulate the tariff of charges upon these roads. These corporations are now in their infancy. They will very soon have developed into full strength and power, and, although in their infancy, they already exert a marked influence upon legislation. They have already won the voices and votes of many of our best and ablest men. These roads will soon be finished. Some of them, at least, will be consolidated, and whether consolidated or not they will practically act together in all measures for extracting the last possible dollar from the public.

A great deal has been said, upon other occasions when this matter was up, in relation to motives. I wish it distinctly understood that in what I have said or may say I impugn the motives of no man, in or out of this House. I have nothing to do with motives; I speak of acts patent to every man who will open his eyes. I speak of future developments, which I predict, but the truth or correctness of which time only can determine. I feel a deep interest in this question, to which alone I speak, because I have seen in my own State such struggles as I think this country is yet to have. I have there seen a railroad influence practically controlling for years the legislation of the State upon all railroad interests. In vain the people protested; in vain they elected to the Legislature members pledged against these railroad schemes. I believe their bills were always passed; nothing but the veto of the Governor saved us; the people were practically powerless. We have seen the same thing in the State of New Jersey, as has been referred to already by some gentlemen. We remember that the people of that State some years ago thoughtlessly and recklessly surrendered some of their rights and privileges to a corporation; and from that time to this they have been struggling in vain to free themselves from the incubrance.

Now, shall we take warning in regard to this matter? The corporations we are now talking about will soon be the greatest, the richest, the most powerful corporations upon earth, the British East India Company, probably, only excepted. They will command a business the extent of which the most vivid imagination cannot now conceive. They will possess a property which will have cost them literally nothing, a property more valuable than any similar property in the world. They will have an army of dependents everywhere ready to do their bidding. They will have an influence sufficient to subsidize all that is evil in the land which they may deem worth subsidizing.

Now, I may be asked if I am opposed to these various Pacific railroads. No, sir; I am as warm an advocate of the Pacific railroad as any man upon this floor; I am in favor of every one of them. And, what is more, had I been a member of Congress when the original acts under which they were chartered were passed by Congress I should have voted for them, with the modifications I am now advocating. Nay, more; I am not among those who deprecate the grant of lands or the subsidies given. It was a great undertaking; and those who undertook it should be richly rewarded. I trust I am incapable of envying the success that must crown the efforts of those men. I am proud of them; they are examples of the advanced American citizen. I glory in their achievements.

But, notwithstanding all that, I am not willing, in my admiration or gratitude, to commit the rights and the privileges of this whole country to the discretion and keeping of these men. We cannot trust them or any other body of men upon earth. There are no men upon earth good enough, wise enough, unselfish enough to possess such powers; and I am unwilling that they should be permitted to control at their discretion the rate of charges upon the travel and transportation between the Atlantic and the Pacific.

We are told that the original act authorized the fixing by Congress of the rate of charges when the roads are finished. But will any man tell me when those roads will be finished, if that is the sole regulation in regard to it? I say that the child is not yet born who will see those roads completed, "within the meaning of that act," as they will call it. Indeed, such a law as that will be no restraint whatever upon them. They will go around the law, and if necessary they will go right through the law. Railroad men understand this thing. We all have seen examples of this kind; probably there is not one of us who does not know instances of them. I do not believe there is one solitary instance in this country where an original restraining charter like this was ever effectual in limiting charges—was ever effectual against any corporation whatever, railroad, express, telegraph, or what not. You must fix it by law, if you would protect the public; there is no other way.

It may be said that the interests of the corporations will regulate this thing. No, sir; the interests of corporations never did and never will have such an effect. Men in their corporate capacity will act as they never would act individually. Every one of us knows, for instance, that while a corporation is bribing or trying to bribe a Legislature, each member of that corporation will nightly upon his knees ask God's blessing upon his enterprises, and daily read sermons inculcating virtue and religion. A corporation acts very much like a mob; nobody is responsible. We know that a mob will commit crimes for which no individual member will hold himself responsible.

I repeat, it is, in my judgment, absolutely essential that Congress should now, before these influences become too overshadowing, take upon itself the duty of regulating the fare on these roads. I warn this House that, unless we do this, the time is not far distant when these roads, instead of being recognized blessings, will be a recognized curse. All the experience that we have had in a smaller way proves this.

Now, sir, I am in favor of these roads. I would give them any legislative assistance that they may ask consistent with the public interests; but I repeat that we should insist upon regulating their rates of charges now instead of providing for doing it at some indefinite time in the future. In the discussions of this subject heretofore some gentlemen have appeared to think that the people have no interest in this question. There seems to be on the part of some gentlemen a nervous anxiety for the rights of the corporation; but have the people no rights? The people have built substantially all that is now built of these roads. They have conferred upon the companies land sufficient to make an empire. They have mortgaged their own farms and houses and lots to raise the money to build these roads. For what have they done all this? Merely to enrich the corporators? Not at all; but to obtain for themselves and their children railroad facilities; and they are entitled to enjoy those facilities not as a favor but as a right, and at reasonable prices.

Mr. PRICE. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that he may offer an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move to amend the substitute by striking out the proviso.

Mr. PRICE. I now yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] eight minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no attack to make upon the Pacific railroad. I am as much in favor of properly fostering the interests of that enterprise as any gentleman on this floor. The constituency that I represent is as much benefited by that enterprise as any constituency represented in this House, provided that great enterprise is not allowed to remain an instrument of oppression, as it is at the present time. The Central Pacific division of that great road is now charging the people of the State of California fifteen cents a mile for freight, and ten cents a mile for passengers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In gold?

Mr. JOHNSON. In gold. The net proceeds of that road, which is only about ninety miles in length, were last year nearly one million and a half dollars. In a very short time that road, like a mighty vortex, will drink up all the wealth of our new and growing State. Now, sir, I am in favor of the passage of this bill, notwithstanding the fact that it creates a commission, which, in my judgment, is a humbug; and I will say, without any reflections upon the gentlemen composing this committee, that it seems to me the intention of the bill to sugar-coat this monstrous engine of oppression so that the people may be content to remain under it for a few years longer. Why should not the proviso be stricken out? Why should not the people of California be protected from this oppression? Why should not these companies be content? Why should not the friends of this bill be content with the amendment I desire to submit, limiting the charges to eight cents a mile for freight and six cents a mile for passengers—nearly twice as much as the charges of any other road in the United States or in the world? And we are paying gold at one end of the line, while at this end you are paying your paper trash.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is any honest intention on the part of this House to protect our people against this oppression, I ask that the demand for the previous question be voted down, and allow this amendment to be made, restricting this commission and not leaving them the latitude of the four winds.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will suggest what his amendment is.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is to restrict the commission in fixing their tariff to eight cents per mile for freight, and six cents per mile for passengers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will look at the original resolution, he will see that it contains a restriction. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] has an amendment to offer to the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa, which covers, perhaps, the original resolution; and I think it will meet also the proposition of the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was speaking of the substitute particularly. If there is such a clause in the original bill, to which I have paid no attention; I did not know it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The original resolution provides that the rates to be fixed shall not exceed double the average amount of the rates of fare for passengers and freight from the Mississippi to the Atlantic ocean in the latitude north of St. Louis, Missouri, which will bring it, I think, less than eight cents per mile.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is the simplest and the straightest proposition, but I will be satisfied with that proposition. If the chairman will agree to that I have no more to say.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to let me move my amendment.

Mr. PRICE. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Before moving my amendment I desire to say a few words.

Mr. PRICE. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. PRICE. If the House will sustain the previous question I will have an hour which I will yield for debate.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the previous question be sustained will not the amendment be cut off?

Mr. PRICE. I have agreed that the amendment shall be offered.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That said tariff to be so fixed shall in no case exceed double the average rates charged on different lines of railroad between the Mississippi and the Atlantic ocean in latitude north of St. Louis.

The SPEAKER. One amendment is already pending, and if there be no objection this amendment will be received.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, by permission of the gentleman from Iowa I desire to say, as one of the members of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, I did not agree to the bill reported to the House by the chairman. I believe that bill to be an evasion of the whole question submitted to the consideration of the committee; and, so far as I am concerned, I cannot give my consent to the proposition. The people along the lines of these roads, so far as my State is concerned, are oppressed as no people were ever oppressed before by railroad corporations in the prices charged for freight and passengers transported over these roads. I am informed the Kansas branch of the Pacific railroad charges far less for passengers and freight transported over its road than the Omaha line and the Central Pacific railroad of California. It seems to me that the people of the United States are building these roads. They are lending to those who are constructing these roads the credit of the Government. Yet, sir, in spite of that fact these corporations but oppress the people by imposing upon the people unreasonable charges for freight and passengers. The people of my State are crying out as one man against these unreasonable charges for freight and passengers transported over this Pacific railroad. I believe it to be the duty of Congress to give to this road sufficient aid to extend it through New Mexico and Arizona to the Pacific coast. At the same time I believe it to be the duty of Congress to relieve the people of the country from the oppression which these roads already in their infancy, as was well remarked by the gentleman from New York, begin to exercise. I wish to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and this House, that the people of the western frontier already appeal to Congress to save them from these monopolies which are beginning even at this very early day to manifest themselves. Hence I have risen to say, by the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] in the moment he has given me, that the people of my State protest and appeal as one man to the Congress of the United States to protect them from these charges, to protect them from the injustice that is heaped upon them.

Mr. PRICE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to make a motion to recommit the joint resolution and amendments to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, with instructions to report a bill regulating the tariff of freight and fare.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield for that motion?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not believe in the policy of deputing the power of Congress to regulate this tariff of freight and fare. I do not believe in putting the power into the hands of any three men who may be friendly or unfriendly to this road, nor in putting it into the hands of other railroads which may be friendly or unfriendly, by regulating their own tariff to regulate the tariff of this road. If a neighboring railroad is unfriendly, it may put its tariff very low; if it is friendly, it may put it very high. So that if the tariff on this road is to be regulated thereby you see it is no security to the people of the country nor to the road. I believe it is the duty of Congress to maintain its jurisdiction over this road by its own laws, and fix the tariff of fare and freight, and I will not consent by my vote to put this matter into the hands of any three men who may be friendly, who may be bought up, or who may be unfriendly. Congress should stand as a fair arbiter between the people of the United States and this corporation, securing all just rights of the people as well as of the corporation. That is all I desire to say on the subject.

Mr. PRICE. I now call the previous question; if the House sustains it gentlemen can have time to debate the question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. PRUYN. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that a resolution was agreed to in the committee providing for the appointment of two persons well skilled in railroad matters, in addition to the three Government officers named, making a board of five.

Mr. PRICE. At one meeting of the committee such a resolution was passed. At that meeting the gentleman from New York was present; but at a subsequent meeting that resolution was rescinded, and the joint resolution passed in the shape it is now reported to the House.

Mr. PRUYN. I was not aware of it. I hope the gentleman will yield me ten minutes.

Mr. PRICE. I will yield eight minutes.

Mr. PRUYN. I am very sorry to hear that the committee rescinded the resolution to add to the board two persons to be selected by the President of the United States, who should be well skilled in the construction and management of railroads. It is quite evident that of the Government officers named, one of them, at least, is not a person who, from his official position, would be likely to be fully informed in regard to matters of this kind—I mean the Attorney General—and that the duties of the other Government officers are so pressing and urgent that they probably never can give much time to the details which this matter necessarily involves. It was therefore proposed in the committee at one time that we should add the other two persons, forming a board of five for the purpose of determining from year to year the tariff of freight and fare, and that resolution was adopted. If it be in order I will move to amend the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Illinois by adding that the committee be instructed to make the addition to the board of two persons, well skilled in the construction and management of railroads. I do it for the purpose of testing the sense of the House on this subject.

With regard to the merits of the matter generally I can only say in the very few minutes that I have that it appears to me that on the whole it will better meet the interest of the public, and that the matter will be more thoroughly investigated, if it is committed to a board of five persons—two of them being such as I have named—than it would be likely to be by the two Houses of Congress with the immense details which are constantly pressing upon them. After all, we would have to act through a committee who would necessarily be burdened with many other matters, and who could not look into this subject with that thoroughness which the details attendant upon it necessarily require. I am in favor, therefore, of the principle involved in the original resolution.

Now, there is one other subject on which I have just time to say a word, and that is the question as to the standard to be adopted—whether we should adopt any or not, and as to the time when it should take effect.

Now, this standard named in the resolution, it will be seen, is a very imperfect, shifting, and uncertain one. It says double the rates of fares on roads east of the Mississippi above a certain latitude. But those rates are constantly changing. They are different on different roads. You cannot tell what they are. And it is a question in my mind whether any commission constituted in this way, with a maximum fixed, would not always lean to the extent of that maximum, and whether it is not better for us to leave the question open entirely, subject to the provision of the eighteenth section of the original charter, by which the profits are limited to ten per cent. on the amount of the cost of the road. It seems to me unfair to this company that before their road is completed, before it is known what it can accomplish, and what it can really earn, we should undertake to interfere with the tariff of fares and freights that they have established, so long as it cannot be shown that they come within the eighteenth section of the original act, which limits their net earnings to ten per cent. If it should appear on investigation by a committee of this House that they are already exceeding that limit, it would be right and within the power of Congress certainly to interfere. But until that time comes it seems to me that it is very unfair for us to step in and assume that a thing has happened which we really know nothing about, or, at any rate, that the information is not sufficient to enable us to judge with that certainty with which we should judge when we interfere with the earnings of a corporation of this kind.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to state to the gentleman and to the House that so far as California is concerned, so far as internal commerce over this road is concerned, the road is already built.

California granted large subsidies; all of her commercial cities that were to be benefited by the road contributed largely; the Legislature voted appropriations for this Central Pacific road, and it is built square across the State of California. We ask protection now. We have done our part, paid our money, and the road is now performing service for us. Why should we wait two, three, five, six, eight, or ten years before we receive any relief from the legislative body having the matter under its control?

Mr. PRUYN. I must resume the floor unless the gentleman from Iowa will allow me further time. I will simply say that, as I understand it, the California road is by no means completed. It is completed across the State of California, but they intend to run it to Great Salt Lake City, some six or eight hundred miles further.

Mr. PRICE. I yield now to my colleague on the committee, from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I deem it proper to say to the House that I have no interest whatever in the Union Pacific railroad or any of its branches; that a distance of many hundred miles intervenes between my residence and the road; that I am not subject, therefore, to the local influences which in some districts will control this question, and that I am, therefore, I think, prepared to look at it in an impartial light. As a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad my attention has necessarily been compelled to this subject.

With much that has been said here in reference to the grasping and evil tendencies of corporations and the necessity for cheap transportation I thoroughly coincide. Corporations, Mr. Speaker, have not only, according to the old maxim, no souls, but they have, as a general thing, but few votes; and perhaps we should all of us increase our personal popularity if we were to provide that this road should carry freight and passengers free of all charge whatever. But, sir, we cannot enter this region without entering at the same time the domain of established law and trenching upon the vested rights of individuals and corporations.

Now, I shall send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, the first portion of the eighteenth section of the original act of 1862, upon which this legislation is proposed to be based. The Clerk will read the part I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That whenever it appears that the net earnings of the entire road and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered for the United States, after deducting all expenditures, including repairs and the furnishing, running, and managing of said road, shall exceed ten per cent. upon its cost, exclusive of the five per cent. to be paid to the United States, Congress may reduce the rates of fare thereon, if unreasonable in amount, and may fix and establish the same by law."

Mr. DONNELLY. It will be apparent, from the perusal of this section, that Congress clearly intended, when it made this grant in 1862, that we should not meddle with this subject of the tariff of freights and travel until "the entire road" was constructed. And there was a good and sufficient reason for this. Congress remembered that this road, during the greater portion of its course, during almost its entire course, would run through an almost uninhabitable region, a region of cactus and sand-plains, where cultivation is possible only by means of irrigation; a region without productions and without population; and hence it was provided that the road should not be interfered with until it was entirely constructed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DONNELLY. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is not the gentleman aware that the law to which he has referred provides that this road shall be built and paid for in sections of a few miles each? The road is completed for ten miles when ten miles are built; that is so stated in the law.

Mr. DONNELLY. I do not see how that touches the question. The provision I have had read is clear that we cannot touch that question of the tariff of freights and charges for transportation of passengers until "the entire road and line of telegraph is completed," and it is proved that it is yielding fifteen per cent. upon its entire capital; that is to say, ten per cent. over and above the five per cent. which goes to the United States.

Now, sir, we have not yet reached that point of time. There have been seven hundred miles of this road constructed in a period of six years since the passage of the act. There is still very nearly one thousand miles of the road to be built. Yet we are here asked to legislate in direct contradiction to the terms of that act, or to pass this resolution, with a proviso such as the committee have appended to it, that it shall not take effect until the road is completed and fully constructed; which cannot be, I take it, in less than three or four years from the present time.

I agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that it is very improper for Congress to take this great power out of its own hands and vest it in the hands of any three men. If this Pacific railroad is to become, as is alleged here, a political power, you would by the passage of this joint resolution force it into the task of creating Cabinets for the purpose of reaching and controlling this subject. And you do it in anticipation of the time when in good faith you could properly have any power to act upon it.

It is true the bill of 1862 provides that Congress may alter or amend the act. But it provides so in these words:

"Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein, alter or amend this act."

And certainly those who have invested their money in the construction of that road, upon a table of profits, and upon their face in an act of Congress which declared that the tariff of charges should not be interfered with until the road was constructed and it became apparent that the road yielded a certain specified profit—those men could certainly complain of bad faith on the part of this Government if it stepped in and interfered with their investment and swept away the very foundation on which their investments were made.

We are not acting in this matter as indifferent parties. We have lent these companies our bonds; we are interested that they shall succeed. If we destroy them we destroy their capacity to repay us the loan advanced them. If, by our legislation, we now endanger the whole fabric of their credit and strike them down and prevent the construction of the intervening one thousand miles of railroad yet to be built we are imperiling the very bonds we have advanced to them, and we will be doing it in the presence of that declaration which I have had read at the Clerk's desk, and which most assuredly said to the capitalists of the world that they should not be disturbed until the road was finished, and then disturbed only when it was proved that the road yielded a profit of fifteen per cent. on the capital invested. We have no data here as to that point. There have been no proofs furnished here that the road yields any such percentage as that. We are legislating in the dark; we are legislating in direct contradiction of the terms of the law, and legislating to meet a contingency which may not arise for five years to come. If we have the right to fix this tariff in the face of that provision of law, then I approve the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] that the whole subject be referred back to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad with instructions to frame such a tariff. I cannot see the propriety of this Congress "farming out" this great work to any set of men. If we cannot trust ourselves; if these imputations which are made upon this floor against the honesty of our motives have any foundation in fact; if we cannot trust our own honesty, what assurance have we that we can trust the honesty of any Cabinet, of any party, acting under any President?

Mr. PRICE. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] fifteen minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know but that there is some reason to complain that too high prices are being charged for carrying passengers and freight on the Pacific railroad. I will say, however, right here, that I have no faith whatever in the method of legislation on this subject that has been attempted by this House. It was for this reason that I was desirous in the first instance to have this measure referred to the committee; and I wish to say here that the committee took action upon it when I was not present. I was not able to be present, and took no part in the action of the committee upon the bill reported today. But if any legislation is to be had in this line—that is, any such legislation as that proposed in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN,] which is a measure of the same species as this—I am certainly in favor of this bill with the proviso as reported by the committee. But, as I have already remarked, I have no faith at all in this kind of legislation.

Now, sir, I will say that while on one railroad in California a much lower percentage may answer than that now charged, upon another as much as it is charging or something near it is necessary. Let me state, for the information of the House, that on the railroad from San Francisco to San José, running a distance of fifty-five miles, the charge for passengers is $2 50, a little less than five cents per mile, which, I believe, is more than is charged on eastern roads; and at the same time there is a competing line by steamer from San Francisco to San José.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman means $2 50 in gold.

Mr. HIGBY. Yes, sir. Let me state further that, in my judgment, when the railroad is completed from Sacramento to intersect the San José road, or to reach San Francisco by some other route, passengers and freight can be carried as cheaply between Sacramento and San Francisco as they are carried between San José and San Francisco. But gentlemen must bear in mind the difference in the grades on different roads. For instance, between Sacramento and the Summit, a distance of a little over one hundred miles, there is an elevation of over six thousand feet. We all know that it costs more to carry freight and passengers over a road with such a grade than it does on a road with little or no grade. I presume that between San Francisco and San José the elevation is not more than two hundred feet in the fifty-five miles between those two points.

From this statement it must be obvious that different roads must have different charges. And I do not conceive that three men to be designated by Congress—fallible men like all others—can ever graduate satisfactorily the charges for passage and freight upon these several railroads. It is possible that on the Kansas branch freight and passengers can be carried for less money than on other parts of the Pacific railroad route. I do not know about that, and I do not profess to give an opinion. Certainly the further you get into the interior the more it will cost.

Now, sir, my proposition would be to get at a thorough investigation for proper legislation on this subject, either through the Committee on the Pacific Railroad or have a special committee for that purpose. Let them make a thorough examination, ascertain what these roads can carry freight and passengers for, and then let Congress fix the limitation for these different roads, that is, the amounts over which they shall not charge. If we would proceed in this way I would have great gratification in that line of legislation. It would have a far better effect than the way in which we are now proceeding. As I have said before, I have no faith in it.

Let Congress fix the price, and not individuals. I think this body is capable of getting information and settling the prices as well as any three men, more or less, outside of Congress.

I believe that the railroads are charging for freight and passengers about the same price paid upon our stages. Let me illustrate. We can go from San Francisco to Stockton by steamer, one hundred and twenty miles, and we have to pay five dollars for the passage, beside what we have to pay for meals and berth. We can go from San Francisco to Sacramento, another line, about one hundred and twenty miles, and the price for the passage is five dollars, beside the charges for meals and berth. When I get to Stockton I give five dollars for stage passage from that point to my residence, forty-five miles, a little more than ten cents per mile. When I get to Sacramento I pay seven dollars to go to my home, seventy miles by railroad and stage, which is ten cents per mile exactly. We have had a railroad constructed on that line for almost ten years, over which we travel now. We have twenty-eight miles distance to go by stage. So the House can see that railroads charge about the same as the stages charged. On the Pacific railroad they charge about the same that the stages charged, no more, perhaps a little less. I think it is very much more than fifteen cents per mile.

I am willing to assume the responsibility of making this investigation, whether this House sees fit to have a committee on purpose to ascertain what these different roads can carry freight for or not. The reason why I am not in favor of the bill as it came from the committee, providing they make us act on this line, is because by it we are changing the railroad law itself. I am not disposed to change it and to pursue this method of leaving the matter to three men. If we are going to change it let us change it thoroughly and do justice. Let us understand the matter and not leave it to three men. If the House will assume this course and this direction I will readily join in that line.

I am not disposed, but I will not be loud-mouthed about it, to leave the railroads to charge enormous prices over and above what they should charge; but I am disposed when we do anything we shall do it with our eyes open and understandingly. That is the proper course. I am not going to limit the railroads simply because the companies will not carry freight and passengers for less than the expense of doing so. I am in favor of a proper adjustment as between the interests of the people and the railroad companies. This is the proper course to be pursued. If this be the course decided upon, if the subject be recommended, I ask that they shall have power to take testimony. Then let that committee report on the subject in the method proposed. If it be desired let the subject go to a special committee for investigation. What I desire is a thorough investigation and intelligent action. I have said all I desire to say on this subject.

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this subject, not only as a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, but as having experience in connection with the working of railroads. I have organized one of the heaviest transportation companies which has ever been conducted or carried on on this continent. I understand fully the advantages and disadvantages of the situation as compared with the transportation company I have organized. In Pennsylvania we can carry tonnage for one third of what it can be carried on the Pacific railroad. One reason is that we have fuel along the line of our roads, while on the Pacific railroad there is neither coal or wood from the valley of the Missouri to the Laramie plains, a distance of seven hundred miles. and on a portion of this road the fuel has to be transported at least half that distance.

I looked at this question ten years ago and examined the valley of the Platte, and subsequently procured the passage of an act in the Legislature of Nebraska in view of getting a land grant to build a road in the Platte valley where it is now constructed. I organized a company there, and then went to the valley of the Kaw and examined the Republican fork down to Kansas City, at its mouth. Familiar with all this subject, and coming back to friends who had money and were ready to invest in railroad enterprises, they declared that they would not take the risk of this enterprise in a country where there was no population. They said there would not be tonnage enough to justify the expenditure.

Others have engaged in the enterprise. I am glad they have done so. I declined to take an interest in the present organization or put money into it or advise my friends, who were men of capital, to do so. But others, more patriotic probably, willing to sacrifice more for the benefit of the country than my friends were ready to do, have put their money into it. They have constructed this road. And now what do we hear? The gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE,] in his remarks, reflects upon the capitalists as a combination to control and fix the rates of fare and freight in his own State. Sir, if it had not been for the money of the East invested in constructing railroads, where would Kansas, particularly western Kansas, be to-day?

I ask gentlemen to look at this question fairly. The time has not come to fix the prices. The original bill provided that on the completion of the road Congress should fix the rates. Now, the proposition is made to take it out of the hands of Congress and put it into the hands of whom? Of three gentlemen. Why, if I owned the Pacific railroad, I would not hesitate to say, if I wanted to charge improper prices, I could buy three men cheaper than I could buy two hundred. [Laughter.] I know what can be done in the railroad business. Remember that these men are purchasable if members of Congress are; and who should know better than a Representative of the people what the wants of the people are? And yet, strange as it may appear, you propose to take this question out of the hands of the people's Representatives and put it into the hands of three men! I am against that folly; and gentlemen on this floor know I have already found Cabinet ministers were not always above the reach of improper moneyed influences.

Mr. PRICE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE.]

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, I have heard many speeches during this session of Congress on the subject of railroad monopolies, of the extortion of railroad companies in their charges for freight and passengers, of the enormous grants made to railroad corporations, and of the men who have enriched themselves by building railroads. I wish to say that, so far as my knowledge extends, in the western country, where I was born and raised, and where I claim to know something about railroads, that all this talk is bosh. With possibly two exceptions there is not a road in the West, so far as I know, that the original projectors—the men who first put their money in them—have not lost from fifty to seventy-five per cent. of all they invested. The exceptions are the Illinois Central railroad and Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad. Most of these roads have been sold out under their mortgage debts and passed into other hands in order to get money enough to run them and keep them up.

Sir, these railroads, which it seems so popular to denounce and decry, have made the West what it is. Gentlemen on this floor representing constituencies numbering ten or twenty thousand, whose districts would be trackless wildernesses at this hour but for these railroads, denounce these railroad companies. The towns, cities, villages, and farms all over the West are the product of these railroads. And while, in many instances, exorbitant charges are made by railroad companies, and the people of Kansas and along the line of the main branch of the Union Pacific railroad may suffer some inconvenience from the high tariff on freight and passengers; and while these corporations, which, I concede, have no souls, probably may ask more than they ought, I wish to enter my protest against this wholesale denunciation of the railroads of the West as being a disadvantage, and in all cases crushing out the energies of the people. Illinois has five hundred thousand inhabitants to-day, and the Government is collecting tax on millions of dollars of property that is the direct product of the Illinois Central railroad. The whole of north Missouri teems with a population that has been brought to that country by the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad. There is no railroad in the West that has not made threefold compensation for all the State or national aid granted to them by the increase of wealth and population and the development of the country.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to state a single fact?

Mr. PILE. I cannot yield. If I had more time I would.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. One moment. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri and to the House that at this moment the merchants of the city of Topeka are transporting their freight by oxen and horse-teams to the city of Leavenworth, a distance of forty-five or fifty miles, instead of sending it by railroad, and at a cheaper price.

Mr. PILE. I will come to that in a moment. Now, sir, I do not believe that there is any practicability in this effort to regulate this matter by legislation. It is like attempting to regulate interest on capital and the price of bread and matters of trade and commerce. Such matters can only be regulated by the laws of supply and demand and the laws of trade. Men's ingenuity can always find means to evade statute laws that attempt to regulate them on questions of labor, the price of bread in cities, the rates of interest on money, or any kindred question.

As has been well said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVODE,] if you put this matter in the hands of three men you will be no safer than you are now. If you attempt to regulate it year by year, as suggested by the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY,] the cost of transporting freight and passengers varies every year or probably every six months in proportion to the cost of the labor and materials that the road has to use in the transportation of passengers and freight, and what would be reasonable to-day would, perhaps, be very unreasonable either for the people or for the road six months hence, and the rates fixed six months from this time would, perhaps, be just as unreasonable six months afterwards. All such efforts to regulate such matters are, in my opinion, impracticable, and can produce no results favorable to the people. What we can do and what we ought to do, in my judgment, is to encourage the construction of competing lines, and by law prevent the consolidation of these competing lines into one or their control by one board of directors.

Mr. PRICE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, while I am ready to concede reciprocal advantages to some extent as between railroad corporations and the people under our railroad system, yet we should not forget as legislators that great public interests are endangered by the immense accumulation of wealth—which is power—in the hands of railroad corporations in this country, which may at some day be wielded to the disadvantage of the masses of the people. While we are legislating for railroad corporations we must not forget nor neglect the rights and interests of the people. I am not inimical to this gigantic enterprise. I have been in favor from the commencement of the Union Pacific railroad and its various branches. I have voted for the various grants of lands and donations of money or bonds, and I am in favor to-day of the speedy prosecution of this road to completion, because I believe it will confer lasting and inestimable benefits upon the people of the United States. But while I am in favor of completing this great work at the earliest possible period of time, I am yet in favor of restricting its powers so that it shall at all times be operated not only to the advantage of the stockholders and the owners of the road, but to the advantage and benefit of the people.

Now, sir, it is time that Congress should seriously consider this most important subject. What amount of capital is already invested in railroads in the United States? It is probably not much less than $2,000,000,000! Truly an enormous sum, and nearly equal to the bonded debt of the United States. The $300,000,000 invested in national banks is but "a drop in the bucket" compared to the amount invested in railroad property. And yet we legislate with reference to banks, to control them and to restrict their power, for fear they will aggrandize power by their great wealth, strike at and perhaps destroy some of the interests and rights of the people. Now, if we have reason to fear the power of bank capital we have a thousand times more reason for fearing the aggrandized power of the railroad monopolies of the country. Sir, look at New Jersey. Have we not an illustration there of the power of a railroad corporation, which controls the legislation of that State, and which holds in its vice-like grasp the political and commercial destiny of that Commonwealth. Look at the State of New York. In the consolidation act, passed by that State some years ago, it was provided as a condition precedent to the consolidation of the lines between New York and Buffalo, that the rate of fare for the transportation of passengers should not exceed the rate fixed in the act of consolidation. Here was an absolute limitation placed upon the power of the railroad corporations in the interest of the people. And what an immense and persistent struggle has been going on to repeal it from that day to this. What for? Was it for the benefit of the people? Was it to advance commerce or to promote the interests of the public? Not by any means. It was, and is, that they may put their hands deeper into the pockets of the people and enrich themselves at their expense.

But for that wise provision in the consolidation act the New York railroads would to-day have been a monopoly that would grind down that people and control them politically and otherwise, as the New Jersey railroads now control the political interests of that State. I now wish to call the attention of the House to a report made by the State engineer of the State of New York in 1855. I ask the serious attention of members to that report made to the Legislative Assembly of that State. They are words of wisdom, which appeal strongly, more strongly than any words of mine can, to the judgment of this House. It would be well if we, in our legislation, would follow the recommendation of that State engineer. I ask the Clerk to read the passages which I have marked.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has expired.

Mr. SPALDING. Let the extracts be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PRICE. I yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman allow the extracts I have indicated to be read? It will take but two or three minutes.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman can print them with his remarks.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to have them read now in order that they may influence the minds of members here.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended sufficiently to make up for the time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] desires.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think no objection will be made; this is an important matter, and we ought not to act hastily.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman propose?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Five minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Notwithstanding the vast advantages which the opening of so many new and improved lines of communication have conferred on the country, we cannot help thinking that these advantages might have been much greater, and that, in the instance of railway legislation, the public interests have been overlooked to a degree that is not very excusable. It is, we admit, no easy matter to decide how far the interference of Government should be carried in matters of this sort. But, at all events, this much is obvious, that when Government is called upon to pass an act authorizing private parties to execute a railway or other public work it is bound to provide, in as far as practicable, that the public interests shall not be prejudiced by such act, and that it should be framed so that it should not, either when passed or at any future period, stand in the way of the public advantage. We believe, however, that a little consideration will serve to satisfy most persons that this important principle has, in the case of railways, and indeed of most descriptions of public works, been in this country all but wholly neglected.

Within a few years past the railway interest has become one of the most important in this country, not only on account of the large pecuniary investments which have been made therein, but also on account of the effect which its development has had in increasing the value and changing the relations of property, trade, and commerce, and in modifying the social conditions of our people. These varied interests and the new circumstances which have been called into existence by the vast and rapid expansion of the railway system, have required additional legal enactments from time to time, but the same supervision and restraints of law which are considered necessary to guard and protect other public interests have not been imposed upon this one to an extent commensurate with its increasing importance. The railroad operations, in which there is a larger investment than in the banks, over which the law exercises supervision, are permitted to control an immense amount of capital, and interests of the greatest magnitude, with no other check than is afforded by an annual statement of their affairs, notoriously incorrect, and in many cases made so systematically, for the purpose of concealing from the stockholders and the public violations of law and want of fidelity to their trusts."

The SPEAKER. Three minutes of the five have now been occupied.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. PRICE. I have not the time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent that ten minutes be given me on my own account.

Mr. HIGBY. I shall not object if the gentleman from Illinois will occupy the time himself. I think his remarks are much better than what he has had read of the remarks of others.

No objection was made.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, while I am in favor of restricting the power of these corporations for the public good, I am also willing that the legislative power of Congress shall not be used exclusively for the benefit of the people without regard to the rights and interests of the corporations. If a bill can be so framed that on the one hand the people can be protected against overcharges, and on the other hand the companies can be protected against a tariff which shall be too low, so that there shall be no remuneration to them, I will be satisfied. I do not rise here to oppose fair legislation in the interest of railroad corporations, but at the same time I am in favor of guarding and securing the rights and interests of the people.

Now, it is known that these great railroad corporations, bearing different names, and whose roads when completed are to make a continuous line of railway to the State of California, have the right to consolidate, and it is probable that they will do so; for the experience of the past warrants the assumption that roads whose interest it is to consolidate will consolidate. By this means they will greatly aggrandize their wealth and power, and they will become so omnipotent as to defy any State legislation. The State of California and the other States which are to be created out of the territory through which this road passes, and perhaps other States, will be absolutely under the control of this great monopoly; and when in this country so vast an amount of capital and power is concentrated in one grand aggregate is Congress itself free from the danger of being controlled by it? Now is the time to "put on the brakes." Now is the time to secure by legislative enactment the rights of the public. If we allow our zeal in behalf of this great work to blind us to the real interests of the people we may do that which we shall regret hereafter, when we shall not be able to undo it; we may perpetrate a wrong which it will be impossible for us to redress. It is well, then, that we proceed cautiously and wisely.

I know, and the chairman of this committee will concede, that the grant to this railroad corporation has been most liberal; and I imagine that the cost of construction will fall much below the estimates which were made when this corporation induced Congress to issue to it United States bonds to the amount of $16,000 per mile, and for a portion of it $32,000, and a portion at $48,000 per mile, and to make it, in addition to that, a magnificent land grant—magnificent, at any rate, as regards superficial measurement, and magnificent, I suppose, in its present and prospective value. I admit that the value of the land depends largely on the road; for wild land very distant from railroad communication is almost worthless. That I concede; and in that view of the case I have voted liberally for land grants, believing that both the Government and the people were the gainers thereby.

But, sir, by a comparison of the cost of constructing railroads throughout the United States, including California, I find that the average cost of building and equipping railroads in the State of Maine has been a trifle over $33,000 per mile; in Alabama, $25,000; in Arkansas, $20,000; in Illinois, $33,000; in Wisconsin, $25,000; in Iowa, $35,000; in California, $34,000; showing that it is no more expensive to build and equip a railroad in California than it has been in Illinois.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HIGBY. Are not those estimates made upon the basis of gold in California and currency in the other States?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I presume so.

Mr. HIGBY. That explains the matter.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So far as I know, there was no difference worth mentioning between the value of gold and the value of paper at the time this estimate was made. So that does not explain the matter.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is there not a great deal of difference in the equipment of the different roads?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Most assuredly there is; and our roads in Illinois, as well as those in Iowa, may be taken as a fair average, perhaps better than a fair average, so far as equipments are concerned. They are well equipped roads. The highest average in the United States for construction and equipment has not exceeded $75,000 per mile, except perhaps some few short-line roads in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield to the gentleman for a minute. I have other facts which I wish to present.

Mr. HIGBY. The Central Pacific Company, in building its road, has paid Chinamen thirty-five dollars per month and their board, and other laborers at forty-five dollars per month and their board; and these prices have been paid in gold.

Mr. INGERSOLL. However that may be, the reports made to the Legislature of California show that the construction and equipment of the railroads in that State have cost on the average only $34,000 per mile, while in seven of the northwestern States the average has been $33,000 per mile. The entire average cost of the roads in the United States per mile has not exceeded $35,000; that is, fully equipped, thoroughly equipped, for the transportation of freight and passengers.

These are the reports. I speak from the books, I speak from the figures, and it is really the best information we have on the subject. And when gentlemen tell us about railroads costing $60,000, $70,000, or $80,000 per mile in this country, it is a mistake, an exaggeration, whether intentional or not I do not know. I have no idea that the road between Omaha and San Francisco will cost more than forty thousand dollars per mile.

Now, sir, I believe that the legislation in the United States with reference to railroad corporations has been more favorable to corporations and far less regard has been paid to individual and public interests than under any other Government; and the time will come, in my opinion, when this subject will be agitated and Congress will be compelled to act and take the control of this great and growing interest. I have no doubt that Congress has the right, under the Constitution, to regulate and control these great commercial highways under the power "to regulate commerce between the several States."

When the Government of Russia determined upon building a railroad from St. Petersburg to Moscow the Emperor issued a special ukase that the railway, which was to connect the two capitals of the empire should be built at the exclusive expense of the Government, in order to retain in the hands of the Government and in the general interest of the people a line of communication so important to the commerce and industry of the State. Let us learn a lesson from this. No man need tell me or the House that any railroad corporation is going to consult the interest of the people along its line. It will get the highest tariff that it can get unless the matter is regulated by act of Congress or State enactment. The only thing which has kept the tariff down between the East and the West, is the competing lines of transportation.

Suppose all these railroads are consolidated; when the West has grown large enough to furnish business for them all then they can fix what rates they please. The Erie Canal has done but little to cut down the tariff. Why? Because it has not the power to carry from Buffalo to New York one fourth of the freight that seeks an outlet to the ocean. We may presume, in the course of time, that the Pacific railroad will be overwhelmed with business. It is expected that it will be one of the greatest thoroughfares for the commerce of the world. It is anticipated that the Japan and China trade will pass across this continent. I hope that anticipation will be realized; but when that time comes this road will prove inadequate to the business. When you find this road now running into a wilderness pays a profit, what will it be when you have completed it, if Congress leaves it to fix its own prices, regulate its own tariff for freight and passengers? What then will be the competing line? What other line will there be between the Atlantic and the Pacific? It matters not how many lines there may yet be built. Congress owes it to the people to protect them in their rights against the power of the monopolies to oppress them or to act in disregard of their rights.

Mr. PRICE. I now yield two and a half minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If I am to be put in the Procrustean bed of two and a half minutes I, of course, can say nothing of the merits of the subject.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Ask the House for an extension.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not wish time should be taken up unnecessarily, and I also want the House to adjourn. Before proceeding I desire to say that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] has prepared a speech on this subject which he expected to deliver to-day, but he has been taken suddenly and severely ill, and I ask that he have leave to print it as part of the debates.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. [See Appendix.]

BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I intended to have pressed the consideration of the appropriation bills for benevolent institutions in this District to-day, but I will not do so, as the minority report has not yet been printed. I ask that a statement of appropriations also be printed, so they may be before the House when the question does come up for discussion and action.

No objection being made, it was ordered to be printed.

CHARGES ON PACIFIC RAILROAD, ETC.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not abuse the generosity of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PRICE. I will give the gentleman two hours if the House will extend the time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not wish it. I do not want to make a speech. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad have reported a substitute for the joint resolution which embraces the main proposition, that this commission shall be established to adjust the rates of freight and passengers. That we all agree to. Now, the other two pending propositions are the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] striking out the proviso that it shall not take effect until the road is finished; which time, I think, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] very conclusively shows, would never probably come in the contemplation of the resolution. If that is stricken out and then the very proper amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] is adopted, we will have substantially the original resolution, which I think we can all agree to. I think it is just and proper that we should pass it in the shape that it will be if we adopt those two amendments.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the House to extend it to fifteen minutes.

No objection being made, the time was extended accordingly.

Mr. PRICE. I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, of course I cannot undertake to discuss this question as its importance demands in the brief time allowed me.

In 1862 Congress chartered the Pacific railroad, and for the purpose of aiding a great national enterprise voted a subsidy of $16,000 a mile and a grant of land. Capitalists hesitated to invest for a long while. The work finally commenced, but was soon stopped for want of funds, and it became necessary to bond the road in addition to the Government subsidy. What was the result? Although the bonds are payable principal and interest in gold, and bearing six per cent. interest, they have been on the market ever since they were issued at about ninety cents on the dollar, while Government bonds, which some gentlemen say are payable principal in greenbacks, have brought from 108 to 110. The stock of the company is now in the market at something over fifty cents on the dollar. Now, if the enterprise is so profitable; if the company are making as much money as gentlemen seem to suppose, how can it be accounted for that the bonds are at ninety and the stock at fifty? I am informed, sir, that within the last three years the entire work would have stopped had it not been for the patriotism and financial boldness of a gentleman who is a member of this House. The profits of the investment are entirely prospective. No dividend has ever been declared, and no one can predict whether, when the road is completed across the mountain, it will be remunerative, so enormous must be the outlay.

But independent of all this, Mr. Speaker, is it just to those who have invested their money in this great national undertaking to appoint this commission? The act of 1862 declares that after the road is completed, if Congress finds that the net income is over ten per cent. on the capital invested, in addition to the five per cent. payable to the Government, it may then regulate the tariff of freight and passengers. Sir, is not the faith of the Government pledged by this provision to the gentlemen who have invested in the company. Ought not Congress, in good faith, adhere to the obligations which it assumed at the time the act of incorporation was passed? It is not fair, and ✓ permit me to say we have no moral right, and I doubt if we have a legal right, to interfere with the matter now. It is true we may alter and amend the original act, but we can only alter and amend without violating the obligations which we assumed under the act itself. One of those obligations was that Congress should not interfere with the regulation of the tariffs of the company until after the entire road shall have been completed, and then only under particular circumstances.

Sir, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] that supply and demand will ordinarily regulate the business of railroads as they regulate the other business of life, and hence that all legislation respecting their tariffs and internal arrangements is generally unwise. It is true that the State of New York has interfered with and limited the tariffs of some of its roads. The roads run between a succession of cities and through a thickly populated and highly developed country. It was found that their receipts were enormous, and moneyed monopolies were apprehended which might endanger the State. The Legislature was wise, and we find the stocks of some of these roads in the market at $1 37. Those cases are not analogous to the one under consideration. Here no dividends have been paid and none for the present are expected. The only thought and struggle now is to complete the road.

The proposition to appoint a commission with power to act before the road is completed is unjust toward those who have invested in the undertaking, and in violation of the faith of the Government.

When the road is completed it will be our duty to interfere and regulate in case the income to the company exceeds that provided for by the act of incorporation.

Until that exigency arises we cannot properly and ought not to interfere. Were the company even now undertaking to exercise their power to the injury or oppression of the people the proposition for a commission to act at once might be excusable.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, the committee, in reporting this joint resolution, were governed by what they conceived to be the legal aspect of the case as well as what they conceived to be the wish and intention of the House in referring the joint resolution to them; and in listening to the debate to-day my opinion has not been changed in reference to that legal part of the question. I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that legally before the completion of the road this matter can be interfered with.

I will say right here that no gentleman upon this floor, from the East or the West, is more in favor of controlling railroad monopolies and keeping the prices of fares and freights within proper limits so as to benefit the public at large than myself. And I will say more, sir, that I believe the Congress of the United States has entire power and authority to control inter-State railroad communication. But, sir, there are other questions that present themselves just here in the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman must excuse me. I think I have exhibited my good nature to an extent unexpected in this House by giving away all my time but seven minutes.

I was about to say that there are other questions connected with this subject that ought to be, in my judgment, considered by this House. We have under the law of 1862 authorized the construction of a railroad to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific. We have paid under that law the subsidies granted by it until now there remain to be completed but nine hundred or one thousand miles of the road right in the mountains where nobody lives. By the provisions of that law already referred to, it was understood by the parties contracting to build the road that no interference would be had on the part of the Government until the completion of the road. I submit to gentlemen whether this is not a possible thing—whether if restrictions should be placed upon these companies which they consider onerous and burdensome, they may not cease to build the road? And if so what is the investment of the Government, that which has already been expended worth? I suggest that as a consideration for the House, a consideration which weighs somewhat upon my mind, for I am free to say here that I am exceedingly anxious that the road should be finished in as short a time as possible, so as to connect this side with the other side of the Rocky mountains.

In reference to the cost of the road, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is slightly mistaken. He need travel only to the State of Pennsylvania to find a road which, if I am not very much mistaken, cost $132,000 a mile.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Was that the average cost of the road?

Mr. PRICE. The cost of constructing and equipping; I refer to the Reading road. I will not be positive as to the exact dollars and cents. But I remember very distinctly, when I was a citizen of Pennsylvania, and when railroads were building there, I heard it stated that the building and equipping of the Reading railroad cost $132,000 per mile. I am very free to say that there are railroads in Pennsylvania, some of which cost over one hundred thousand dollars a mile. And I think it is equally true that roads built in California, since the time to which the statistics relate that were read by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] have cost over one hundred thousand dollars a mile. And the most expensive part of the road to connect the Atlantic and the Pacific is yet to be built. And if every burdensome restriction is to be now placed upon the company, I would suggest that it is within the range of possibility that the construction of the road may stop, and the investment of the Government become good for nothing.

The committee were governed by these considerations. By these considerations my own judgment is now governed. I think, in view of the facts which already exist in reference to the law and the building of the road, as it has progressed up to this time, and the condition in which the road is to-day, you had better allow the restriction to commence to operate when the road is finished; or, if the House think that will tend to delay the completion of the road, let the time be fixed for the completion of the road. If it progresses in future at the rate it has progressed for the last two years, then two years more will see the road completed. I am not prepared now to say when the road will be completed; but judging of the future by the past, I think it is safe to say that the road will be finished in about two years. My opinion is that the committee, in reporting this resolution, has arrived at the nearest possible point of correctness; that the interest of the people and of the country will be better subserved by the passage of the resolution in the shape in which they have reported it than in any other.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, to recommit the joint resolution with instructions to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to report a bill regulating the tariff of freight and fare on the Pacific railroad.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 46.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is it proposed that the committee shall have leave to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. It is not; that would require unanimous consent.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

The question was again taken upon the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 69, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Beaman, Benjamin, Blair, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Covode, Dodge, Donnelly, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Golladay, Grover, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, McCormick, Moorhead, Mungen, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Perham, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Raun, Ross, Scofield, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Twichell, Van Aernam, Welker, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Blaine, Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cullom, Eckley, Eggleston, Elia, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Holman, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Judd, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Marshall, McCarthy, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Peters, Pike, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Sawyer, Shanks, Taber, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aiken, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Boutwell, Cary, Cook, Cornell, Daves, Dixon, Briggs, Eldridge, Finney, Fox, Gravelly, Griswold, Haight, Asahel H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jones, Kitchen, Keontz, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Maynard, McCullough, Mercer, Morgan, Morrissey, Mullins, Phelps, Pomeroy, Robinson, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Starkweather, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Wood—38.

So the motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN,] to amend the substitute by striking out the proviso.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] will withdraw that motion and let us take the vote on the main proposition.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I decline to withdraw the motion. I am opposed to the bill and all the amendments.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to; there being—ayes 36, noes 64.

The question again recurred on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, to amend the substitute by striking out the following words:

Provided, however, That this shall not take effect until there shall be a continuous line of railroad completed and in running order from Omaha to Sacramento.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 48, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Blair, Bromwell, Burr, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Eckley, Elia, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Hawkins, Holman, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Julian, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, McCormick, Moore, Moorhead, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Randall, Robertson, Shanks, Stewart, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Butler, Chanler, Covode, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Jencks, Judd, George V. Lawrence, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, Miller, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Poland, Price, Pruyn, Raun, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taber, Thomas, Twichell, Van Aernam, Welker, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Buckland, Calkins, Cary, Cornell, Daves, Dixon, Driggs, Finney, Fox, Gravelly, Griswold, Haight, Asahel H. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Keontz, Ladin, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Maynard, McCarthy, McCullough, Mercer, Morgan, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Phelps, Pile, Pomeroy, Robinson, Sawyer, Selye, Shellsbarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stone, Taffe, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Wood—66.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, to add to the substitute the following proviso:

Provided, That the said tariff to be so fixed shall in no case exceed double the average rates charged on the different lines of railroad between the Mississippi river and the Atlantic ocean in latitudes north of St. Louis.

The amendment was adopted.

The substitute, as amended, was agreed to. The joint resolution, as amended by the adoption of the substitute, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the joint resolution in full.

The joint resolution, as amended, was read.

The question being on the passage of the joint resolution,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment reported by the committee to the title. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read as follows: A joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

The amendment was adopted; and the title, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the votes by which the joint resolution was passed and the title agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 475) to extend the charter of Washington city, also to regulate the selection of officers, and for other purposes.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY PENITENTIARY.

Mr. FLANDERS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be instructed to inquire as to what further legislation is necessary to enable the Secretary of the Interior to provide a site and authorize the location of a penitentiary in the Territory of Washington, as already provided for by act of Congress; and that said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HULBURD and Mr. COOK were granted indefinite leave of absence after to-morrow.

OUTRAGES UPON AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, &c., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to inform this House of all the facts (when they come to his knowledge) in regard to the treatment of certain American citizens reported to have been unjustly and unjustifiably arrested, imprisoned, and flogged while in prison by authority of an officer of the Government of Mexico.

Mr. HARDING. I object.

PRIZE-MONEY CLAIMS.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the communication from the Secretary of the Navy relative to claims for prize money be printed for the use of the Navy Department.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand extra copies, in pamphlet form, one hundred being for the use of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the bill to reduce into one act and amend the laws relating to internal tax.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the preceding resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope not. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to make his speech in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union this afternoon.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. MUNGEN. Allow me a few moments for a personal explanation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That can be done in committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. If we go into committee it is with the understanding that no business is to be done.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOODBRIDGE in the chair.)

Mr. BROOMALL took the floor.

Mr. MUNGEN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a personal explanation.

Mr. BROOMALL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to put myself right upon the record. Yesterday I offered a resolution that the powers of the select Committee on the Treatment of Union Prisoners and Soldiers be enlarged so as to provide for an inquiry into certain matters. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] objected, and said that information was already before the House. That placed me in a false position before the House of asking for what was already before it. I now declare that information is not before the House nor the special committee, and I defy my colleague to prove his assertion of yesterday. He cannot do it.

When I had the honor last session—I think in July—to introduce a resolution on the same subject it was laid upon the table on motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURNE.] It was then laid upon the table on the ground that there was no person to take the responsibility of saying there was ground for it. I now say, in the first place, if there is any such information of this kind before the House I do not know it; and in the second place, that I can prove by the testimony of officers of high position both of the United States and confederate troops that the proposition was made by the confederate government to pay three times the price in gold, cotton, and tobacco for medicines for our soldiers at Andersonville and other southern prisons; that those medicines should be put under charge of Federal surgeons, and be by them taken in person to the different southern prisons and used and distributed to and for the use of Union prisoners alone; that this offer was made by the so-called confederate government through the proper officers to the proper officers of our Government, and was communicated by these latter officers to the proper heads of our Government, and that no response nor attention was paid to the proposition, although our soldiers were dying in those prisons for want of medicine, and the confederate government informed the proper officers of this Government of that fact in connection with the proposition.

I can prove that these propositions were received by our officers when transmitted to the proper authorities, and that they never received any response. I want the blame to rest where it belongs. If any of our men are guilty let them suffer as well as others. If our soldiers were dying, as was certainly the case, for want of medicine, and it was thus placed in the power of our authorities to relieve them, why did they not do so? The confederates told them this was so; offered to pay three times the appraised value for medicines, send them with our own men, to be used for the benefit of our own sick soldiers exclusively. What I desire is to have these points established. I hold myself personally responsible to establish the truth of what I say. This House lays my resolution on the table. Why? Are gentlemen afraid of the truth? Will any gentleman say that if our authorities are answerable for the deaths of those brave fellows in the prisons of the South that our authorities should not bear the blame? Let justice be done though the heavens fall. I am satisfied that officers of our own Government are particeps criminis in the foul transaction. Let them be held up to public scorn; yes, let them receive the justice due to them. Better men have been hung. But this House stops investigation into this question. It has twice defeated my proposition to investigate this matter. By its overwhelming Republican radical power it has laid this matter on the table, smothered it, refused to allow the committee to investigate. If gentlemen on the other side can stand this I can. The people will inquire and must be answered.

POWERS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman, the bill which I propose to consider is one presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] bearing the ominous title of "A bill to test the constitutionality of questionable acts of Congress." It provides that whenever any act of Congress shall be vetoed by the President on the ground of the unconstitutionality of any of its provisions and shall afterward be enacted into a law by the vote of two thirds of both Houses, the President shall cause a fictitious case to be instituted in the Supreme Court of the United States to try the constitutionality of the same. It further provides that the Attorney General shall contest the act, or the questionable provisions of it, and the Speaker of the House, by himself or counsel, shall defend it; that the cost of the proceeding, including counsel fees, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States; that the judgment of the court, if in favor of the contestant, shall render the act, or the contested parts of it, null and void, and that until such judgment is pronounced the same shall be deemed constitutional and valid.

Before proceeding to discuss the purposes of the bill it may be well to remark that, having in view the provision last cited, it would be difficult to imagine a more questionable act of Congress than this if it should become a law. The theory, as I understand it, is that an unconstitutional law is not a law at all and never has been, and the power of Congress to make such a law valid up to the time of its being declared otherwise can neither be found in nor outside of the Constitution. If Congress can make such a law valid up to the time of the decision of the court, it is difficult to see why it may not make it valid forever. The author of the bill evidently considers the business of the Supreme Court to be repealing laws instead of pronouncing upon their validity and meaning.

No one acquainted with the antecedents of the learned gentleman would suspect him of an intention to increase the power of the Representatives of the people at the expense of a branch of the Government in no way dependent upon the people. Yet such might be the result of his proposed measure. He has no great faith in what he is fond of calling the "fragmentary bodies" now usurping, as he thinks, all power in the country. He believes them capable of any enormity. Suppose these fragmentary bodies should enact a law abolishing the Supreme Court. It is true such a law would be unconstitutional. But up to the time of its being declared so, by the terms of his bill it would be valid. A decision of the Supreme Court would terminate its validity; but, in the meantime, there is no Supreme Court, and hence there can be no such decision. If this is what the gentleman means to bring about he must have more faith than anybody else has in the possible restoration of his own political party to power in Congress.

But, supposing the defect remedied, what are the purposes of the bill? The gentleman means to create a third branch of the national Legislature, a body wholly unknown to the Constitution. He means to enable a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court to convert the qualified veto of the President into an absolute one. It was a great stride toward the creation of unlimited power when the Constitution authorized the President to forbid the enactment of a law unless by two thirds of the Representatives of the States and people. But here is a proposition to enable the President, with the aid of three judges, appointed by him and in no way responsible to the people, to forbid the enactment of a law even by the unanimous vote of all the Representatives. What a monstrous proposition is this.

The power of the Supreme Court in treating as null and void an act of Congress is great, but it has its constitutional limits. It does not extend to all laws. There are certain questions upon which the power of Congress is supreme, upon which that body is the sole and final judge of the constitutionality of its own proceedings. What would be thought of the Supreme Court annulling an act of Congress declaring war? President Buchanan believed it to be unconstitutional to coerce States. If he had remained in power he would have vetoed the acts of Congress providing the means to put down the rebellion. With the help of the bill under consideration he would have sent John Doe and Richard Roe into the same tribunal which pronounced the Dred Scott decision, where his Attorney General would have been even too glad to back up his written opinions. The decision of that tribunal, as then constituted, is hardly even matter of conjecture. I am not willing to say the result would have been satisfactory to the learned author of this bill, but I will not risk my reputation for veracity or judgment by saying it would not.

The Supreme Court has already frequently held that it cannot decide political questions. It cannot determine whether a given organization is or is not a State. An act of Congress admitting a new member into the Union is not open to the supervision of the Supreme Court except for the mere purposes of construction. That tribunal may say in a proper case and between proper parties what Congress meant by the language used, but it cannot question the right of Congress to admit the State. What are and what are not States of the Union is to be declared by Congress, and from its decision in the premises there is no appeal and no possibility of reversal or revision of it.

The people of Arkansas, acting under the authority of an act of Congress, have formed themselves into a body politic to be called the State of Arkansas. Their frame of government is now before Congress for approval or rejection. The action of Congress in the premises, if in the shape of a bill, will be presented to the President. Andrew Johnson, if in power, will veto it for unconstitutionality. It will be passed by the requisite two thirds of both Houses over his veto. Under the gentleman's bill the President could invoke the aid of a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court to set at naught the will not only of the people of Arkansas, but of all the people of the United States, as expressed through their legally constituted Representatives. The mere statement of such a proposition is enough to condemn it unless, indeed, in the estimation of those who believe that communities and individuals forfeit nothing by the commission of crime.

Great as is the power of the Supreme Court, I deny that in any case it extends to deciding laws to be unconstitutional. It decides the rights of parties in proper existing cases, but it can make no decree rendering void an act of Congress. To call forth its functions there must be a complainant and a defendant, by whatever names called. There must be something claimed on the one side and denied on the other; and the sole business of the court is to decide the particular question raised. In doing this it may refuse to consider that as valid law which purports to be so. It may base its refusal upon what it declares to be the unconstitutionality of the law; but that declaration is no part of the decision, no part of the judgment of the court. The judgment binds only the parties. The declared ground of the judgment binds nobody, not even the parties. It does not bind the court. That tribunal in the next similar case may hold the law valid, and if wrong be done by the vacillation it is without remedy.

In fact, declaring a law to be unconstitutional, and basing a judgment between parties upon that declaration, is nothing more than giving notice to the world that the court will probably decide other similar cases the same way.

How different is all this from the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He would allow the Supreme Court upon the mere motion of the President, without parties, without argument by any one interested to sustain the law, to strike from the statute-books laws upon which the lives and property of millions depend without the possibility of their being heard in defense of their rights. The proposition is subversive of all the principles which govern courts of justice. What becomes of the right of trial by jury secured to me in the Constitution itself? What becomes of my right to be confronted with my accuser; my right to hear the testimony upon which my case hangs; my right to plead my own cause before the tribunal which judges me, if that tribunal may in my absence, without notice to me, at the instance of other parties unconnected with, possibly antagonistic to me, sweep from the statute-books the laws upon which my rights depend?

It is true my case may be hard if the Supreme Court should decide my neighbor's similar case against him after full hearing on the ground of the unconstitutionality of a law. But the decision does not conclude me. As to me the law still exists; I may present my case and invoke the law and be heard in its defense. The author of the bill has good reason to know that the minds of judges change, that judges themselves change. The same or other judges may hold the law to be valid. At the very least I will not be condemned in person or property without a hearing.

I have said that the minds of judges change. My colleague himself is a notable example of this. If any gentleman has the curiosity to see how slight a circumstance is required to produce the most surprising oscillations in the opinions of grave and learned men sworn to administer the law according to their consciences, let him refer to the case of Guthrie's appeal in 1 Wright's Pennsylvania Supreme Court Reports, and read on page 23 the able opinion of one of the judges. Some members of the bench examine questions, determine them, and adhere to the result arrived at. Others drift with the current like a log in a stream and are of precisely the same use in shaping the course of things around them.

Now, a bench composed in whole or in part of wooden judges might drift here and there with the changing wind and tide, and might hold a law null and void to-day which it held valid yesterday, and may hold so to-morrow. What provision does the learned gentleman's bill make for this state of things? The judges, at the instance of the President, may declare a law null and void. Presently a case may come up between actual parties involving its validity, and may find the judges in the condition of those who decided Guthrie's appeal, swayed away from the moorings and on the opposite side of the stream. Can they reverse their former decree? If so, their business looks very like repealing and re-enacting laws; and if so, the project promises us very little advantage in the way of certainty and stability. If they cannot reverse themselves they must do injustice to the party relying on the law, and decide his case against their solemn convictions of duty.

But why is this extraordinary measure proposed? Have the instances of unconstitutional legislation been so frequent within the period of our country's history as to require some guard beyond that provided by the Constitution? In the eighty years of our existence, with legislation to the extent of volumes by every Congress, with litigation requiring the constant action of the Supreme Court, it is remarkable that so few cases can be found of acts declared void on this account. During the whole period no important act of Congress has been pronounced unconstitutional. Certainly there is nothing in the past which warrants the creating of so extraordinary a jurisdiction.

But why is this measure proposed at this time? What questionable acts of Congress are in the mind of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? Why does he desire to submit the action of the Representatives of the people to this peculiar supervision just now? An examination of his speeches during the present session will disclose the reason. He is aiming at the reconstruction acts. He thinks the States lately in rebellion are valid States of the Union, with all the rights and powers of other States. In his speech of March 23 last, alluding to the passage of the first of these acts, he says:

"The fact is that legal State governments did then exist in every one of these States, and had existed in some of them from the date of the Declaration of Independence; in others from the time of their being taken into the Union; State governments republican in form and fact; State governments that Congress had often recognized and acknowledged; State governments that are indestructible by any power less than the voice of the people, because that was the power that called them into being."

If this proposition were true then I agree with my colleague that the reconstruction acts are unconstitutional. But is it true? Are the organizations existing in the South States of the Union, and have they been so recognized by Congress? The latter part of this question is of easy solution when the former is answered. Organizations corresponding to some extent with these have been recognized as States of the Union; that is to say, organizations covering respectively the same territories and existing up to 1860. The question, therefore, resolves itself into this: are the present organizations identical with those? To determine this question certain principles upon which depend the identity of a succeeding Government with the former one present themselves. Every civilized Government contains within itself the elements of change under the operations of which it remains the same Government. The death of a monarch and the accession of his successor, the running out of a dynasty and the substitution of a new one, the change of constitutions under proceedings instituted in accordance with the provisions of the old ones, are familiar instances of this. Wherever the changed Government comes in by the operation of law, whatever the change may be, it is a mere continuation of the old Government. But where the change is by force and in violation of law, that is to say by revolution, the Government thereby formed is a new one to the extent of the change. Let me illustrate this. No one can pretend that the empire of France is the same Government with the republic of France which preceded it, nor that either is the same with the monarchy which gave place to the republic. Again, if the revolution in England which resulted in the accession of William of Orange was a true revolution, then his Government was a new one. This result is avoided in English history by giving legal effect to the acts of Parliament which called that monarch to the throne and deposed his predecessor. I am not disposed to question the soundness of this view, nor the omnipotence of Parliament in the premises.

To apply these principles to the point in question it is only necessary for us to ascertain whether the organizations existing in the South succeeded to the former ones by the operation of law or by revolution. At the commencement of the rebellion a State government existed and was recognized by the United States in Georgia. Is the present one either that or its legitimate successor? Did the present one arise out of the former by any regular legal process, or was it raised up antagonistic to the former and upon its ruins? History alone can determine this question.

It is not necessary to my argument to maintain that the people of Georgia forfeited their State government by rebellion. I might even admit, though I do not, that that government survived the war and was in full legal operation, as a component member of the Union, at its close. It is sufficient for me to commence with the events of the summer of 1865. Shortly after the surrender of Lee the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the forces of the United States, took military possession of Georgia, deposed the executive, legislative, and judicial officers of the Government he found there, established a temporary organization and appointed a provisional governor.

Whether he did right or wrong in this, no one will pretend that it was done pursuant to the laws of Georgia. No one will pretend that the government he instituted was either the preëxisting one or its regular and legitimate successor. If matters had stopped there, at least, the old government was destroyed. But the President did more. He issued his proclamation to the people of Georgia, in which he declared that the rebellion in its consequences had left them entirely without civil government, and he called upon them to meet at times and places designated by him, and form a State government according to regulations which he prescribed. In those regulations he fixed the qualifications of voters, granting and withholding suffrage where he saw fit. Now, by whatever authority this was done, no one can pretend that it was done pursuant to the laws of Georgia. The result of all this is the organization existing there, and that organization is therefore the mere creature of the President's proclamation. It has no validity except what is derived from the fiat of the Executive. The constitution framed under the direction of the President was never even submitted to the votes of the people of Georgia. It is a fixed fact, not to be controverted by the advocates of the indestructibility of State governments, that the State government of Georgia which existed in 1860, and was recognized by the United States, was destroyed, and that the present one was founded upon its ruins. Grant that the destroying and recreating power had no legal right to do all this, still the stubborn historical fact remains that all this was done, and not alone in Georgia, but in all the other unreconstructed States.

Now, these creatures of executive legislation; these organizations which sprang up in the summer of 1865 where all civil government had been destroyed, have never been "recognized and acknowledged" by Congress. The proposition of my colleague, therefore, is not true.

The controversy about these organizations is simply this: the President and Congress both agree that upon the final surrender of the rebels no civil governments existed in the South which could be recognized as States of the Union. Both agree that it was proper and necessary that the inhabitants of that country should be empowered to create State governments; both agree that the prescribing of the time, place, and manner of doing this, the qualifications of electors and officers, and the general scope of the authority of conventions must be done in some way by the Government of the United States. But here the difference of opinion begins. The President maintains that he alone can do this, and that in doing it he needs no law, that he is a law unto himself. On the other hand, Congress maintains that doing this is legislation; that forming State governments can only be done under enabling acts. The President has issued his proclamations, and under them his organizations have sprung up. Congress has passed its enabling acts, and under them the people of that country are forming new State governments. It is this latter process which my learned colleague calls unconstitutional.

It is remarkable that the gentleman has no word of complaint of the President's proclamations. It is strange that he should tacitly even indorse the executive usurpation which pronounced the original States destroyed and made new ones, fashioning them according to his own single will and pleasure, without consulting the people interested, without even submitting them to those people for adoption or rejection. It is strange that an ex-judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania should accord to the President's proclamation more legal force than to an act of Congress. Let me ask him by virtue of what provision of the Constitution the Executive creates States at pleasure either in conquered territory or anywhere else?

Yet my amiable colleague frets and fumes because there are no representatives in either House of Congress from these presidential abortions. He even thinks we cannot legally impeach Andrew Johnson because those creatures of his are not represented. Hear him:

"Mr. Speaker, so sure I am that the American people will respect this objection that I will say, if I were the President's counselor, which I am not, I would advise him, if you prefer articles of impeachment, to demur both to your jurisdiction and that of the Senate, and to issue a proclamation giving you and all the world notice that while he held himself impeachable for misdemeanors in office before the constitutional tribunal, he never would subject the office he holds in trust for the people to the irregular, unconstitutional, fragmentary bodies who propose to strip him of it. Such a proclamation, with the Army and Navy in hand to sustain it, would meet a popular response that would make an end of impeachment and impeachers."

The foregoing delicious morsel of doubly distilled democracy is taken from the speech of my estimable colleague, delivered, or rather purporting to have been delivered, in the House of Representatives on the 4th of February last. The actual delivery of such sentiments in the House would probably have brought down its censure upon the person uttering them. It may not be known to the country that there is a mode of getting into the published proceedings words which it would not be safe to utter upon this floor. I say purporting to have been delivered with reason, for the eloquent remarks first found existence for the enlightenment of the world published in the Daily Globe.

The remarks themselves are a truthful exposition of the gentleman's political sentiments. As mere words they would do credit to a leader of the southern democracy in 1861, but they are mere words. There is no fight in the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This is a fair sample of the sayings of the Democratic leaders of his section at the breaking out of the rebellion, and I caution the President now not to be deceived by them. Let him take warning by the late rebels who listened to the same language from their political associates in the North, and found, to their sorrow, when too late, that northern professions and northern pledges of assistance were words, mere words.

I trust, therefore, that Andrew Johnson will not count on too much assistance from this quarter; that he will not be betrayed by democratic professions, which are sure to prove false, into using the Army and Navy "to make an end of impeachment and impeachers," and to hold by force his office against "the irregular, unconstitutional, and fragmentary bodies who propose to strip him of it."

If my colleague were the adviser of the President, he would counsel him to issue a proclamation. The gentleman has great faith in proclamations. They have already created his ten pet States, and now he wants them to answer eleven articles of impeachment! Imagine the President establishing his military headquarters at the White House and defending his position with this species of artillery! See him, supported by his gallant Pennsylvania champion, intrenched behind a bulwark of foolscap and up to his knees in ink, firing proclamations at long range against the loyal millions of America. Probably they might be more effective than "the feeble javelin of aged Priam," but recent experiments with these things have not been encouraging. The "chief of the lost cause" tried them. He issued proclamations, and against the same enemy, but they did not save him.

Let it be fully understood that the gentleman is not here urging the claims of the State governments which existed in the South in 1860. These, as I have shown, have long ceased to exist. He is the especial advocate of those created by presidential usurpation after the destruction of the former ones. He justifies this usurpation because he sets up its results as legal. Any one unacquainted with his peculiar political principles would be at a loss to determine upon what ground he concedes to the President alone the right to create States. Does a knowledge of those principles solve the enigma? Is his preference for irresponsible executive power due to the fact that the President's attempts at reconstruction have placed the South in the possession of the late rebels? have effected a complete surrender to the enemy of all we gained by the expenditure of so much blood and treasure? Was he one of those, who during the entire war prophesied its ultimate failure on our part and are disappointed by the non-fulfillment of their prophecy? It would afford me pleasure to answer these questions in the negative, but I dare not.

The leading complaint of my colleague against the reconstruction acts is that they extend the right of suffrage to black men. He is afraid of negro domination in America, yet he professes to be a friend to the black man. For his own good he thinks the right of suffrage should be denied him. Possibly it might be better for us all to be well governed by a good monarch, but it is difficult to make us think so.

The granting of the right of suffrage to the loyal men of the South, without regard to race, was demanded by the loyal white men as a means of protection against the unrepentant enemies of the country, and it would have been an act of unparalleled baseness to refuse it. But there is a higher and holier reason. During the entire rebellion no black man was ever found willingly fighting in the ranks of the enemy. No Union soldier ever asked aid of a black man and was refused. No refugee from rebel oppression ever hesitated to trust his life to the black man, and in no single instance was the trust ever violated. True, when all around them were false, they fought nobly for the country to which they owed so little. If the black men of the South had been as traitorous as the white men, the flag of the country would never have reappeared upon Fort Sumter. The right to participate in the Government was purchased for their race by the blood of black men, shed upon every battle-field of the South, and he who would deny the right now is unworthy the name of an American citizen.

There is a still higher and holier reason. In the day of our trouble, when we invoked the aid of the Ruler of nations to remove the heel of the oppressor from our necks, we declared that all men are created equal, and that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. On ninety annual returns of the day we have solemnly reaffirmed these truths. Now, the blacks of America are men. They are among the governed. Thus, by our own solemn showing, they are created our equals, and their consent is necessary to the just powers of the common Government. This consent is something more than mere submission. The galley-slave submits; the victims of oppression everywhere submit. We have established the ballot-box as the only sufficient means of conserting, and it is mocking Heaven's justice, to exclude from it any man merely because he is not of our lineage.

I am willing to concede the claim of my colleague, that he is actuated by no hostility to the black race. I will even admit, if he desires it, that he loves the negro as ardently as his old political friends of the South, the evidence of whose devotion you can see to-day in the very countenances of the southern negroes. Oh, no; my colleague does not dislike the negro. His position is plain enough. He is, and always has been, an earnest and consistent opponent of universal suffrage. He gives us his record. More than thirty years ago, when a member of the convention which formed the present constitution of Pennsylvania, he takes care to remind us he defined his position upon this subject. In his remarks of February 23 last he cites several pages from a speech which he delivered in that convention in favor of disfranchising the blacks. The quotation is learned, eloquent, and unanswerable from his stand-point. Voting is a privilege not to be thrown away upon the mere multitude. It should be reserved for those who are born to rule. But the quotation which the gentleman makes does not do his efforts to restrict the right of suffrage full justice. Probably the want of space in a single speech or modesty prevented him from quoting more of his doings in that convention. Out of my regard for him and to make the proof of his consistency more perfect I cite the following from the fifth volume of the published debates of that convention, page 443, which I find in the Congressional Library. My colleague asks to be judged by the record. We will judge him by the record.

A resolution was pending which provided for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the future immigration of blacks into Pennsylvania. Mr. Thomas, of Chester county, had proposed to include, also, foreigners. Now follows the quotation:

"Mr. WOODWARD moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the words 'and that the said committee be also instructed to inquire into the propriety of so amending the constitution as to prevent any foreigners who may arrive in this State after the 4th day of July, 1841, from acquiring the right to vote or hold office in this Commonwealth.'"

This proposition my colleague supported in an able and earnest speech, in which he said:

"There are very many of those emigrants who know nothing of political privileges in their own country before they emigrate to this. The word is unknown to them, or if they hear of it at all they hear of it as something in which they have no participation. Is not this the fact? Sir, we all know that it is. We know that very many of these emigrants never enjoyed any political privileges themselves; that they have no knowledge of them; and, least of all, have they any knowledge of our people, our Government, or our institutions. The acquirement of this knowledge is not the work of a day. They have no sympathy in common with us; they have no qualifications to render them fit recipients of these high political privileges."

Again, he says:

"I would permit them to acquire wealth, to pursue objects of their own ambition. I would, in short, allow them to become, in all respects, equal citizens with us except only in this one matter of political privileges. All their natural and all their civil rights should be amply guaranteed and protected; and they should become citizens in common with us in relation to all objects except voting and holding office."

Let no man after this accuse my colleague of inconsistency in his opposition to universal suffrage. It is only fair toward the honorable gentleman, however, to say that he disowns some of these opinions now. Even he, within the last thirty years, seems to have learned something. He will let the Irishman vote now, and that, too, in Pennsylvania. The progressive tendency of the age has not entirely left him in the background. He has made some advance toward universal suffrage, very slow but very sure. This is hopeful. May we not predict a similar advance within the like period of the future? With the evidence of his capacity to learn which the last thirty years have exhibited, would it be too much to say that at the end of another thirty years he will not deny the right of suffrage even to the black man?

I must not, however, promise too much for my worthy colleague. I meet with some passages in his speech of March 23d last, already referred to, which are not encouraging. He evidently does not like the leveling doctrine of the early fathers, and he is not alone in this. The great moral truths presented so forcibly in the earlier sentences of the Declaration of Independence have always been a stumbling-block to the admirers of class government in America. The doctrine of the equality of human rights is peculiarly unacceptable to those who by some fortunate chance have arisen from an obscure position of which they have the bad taste to be ashamed.

The principles laid down in 1776 by men who staked their lives upon the truth of what they uttered have been denounced as "a fanfaronade of nonsense." They have been called glittering generalities. Thus it is that the equality of man in the sight of his Maker is derided and repudiated, and by none more earnestly than by the puffed up offspring of those who blacked boots and swept sidewalks.

But it was saved to the Democracy of Pennsylvania to furnish the world with the ingenious if not lucid mode of explaining away the sublime utterances of the great fathers contained in the following paragraph. I cite from the speech last alluded to:

"The Declaration of American Independence is often misapplied to this subject. Thirteen English colonies were in the act of throwing off and abjuring the only civil Government under which they had ever lived. That Government set aside, they were re-committed to a state of nature; and in a state of nature, antecedently to the formation of civil government, the Declaration, copying Locke, declares—

"That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

"But it goes on immediately to declare that 'to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.'"

"Thus that immortal instrument brings into sharp contrast the freedom and equality of a state of nature, and the restricted freedom of a state of government. It does not predicate absolute freedom and equality of a state of government, but of a state of nature before civil government has intervened or been set up. To secure these natural rights governments are formed, and government creates distinctions and inequalities, for some must rule and others obey, else you have no government at all. If I am too weak to defend and secure my natural rights standing alone, I will associate with others in like condition and give up some of my natural rights for the sake of forming with them a commonwealth that shall secure to us all the great rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. For the sake of these great interests I will assent to a condition of inequality and subjection which nature never ordained. Such is the manner in which civil government supervenes upon natural rights, and the misconception which is so frequently made of the Declaration of Independence consists in applying to a state of government that which it predicates of a state of nature. The Declaration of Independence never became an article of the Constitution nor an institute of the Government. The colonies, I repeat, were passing from one Government to another, and in the transition they called to mind their natural rights, that the government about to be formed might secure those that are specified. But, while these rights are distinctly asserted as proper objects of governmental protection, neither the absolute freedom nor equality of individuals in a state of civil government is affirmed."

"I have groped among this collection of words for some time in search of the idea intended to be conveyed and have found it. It is this: by nature all men are equal. It is the province of Government to render them unequal. By nature they are endowed with certain inalienable rights. It is the province of Government to compel them to bargain these away."

Now, in my simplicity, I had thought that precisely the reverse of the former of these propositions is true. I had thought that by nature men are unequal—some being wiser and some stronger than others; and that Governments are intended to compensate these inequalities by bringing human actions under the operation of laws which are no respecters of persons, and thus preventing the strong and the wise from trampling upon the weak and the ignorant. My colleague admits that Government is or should be founded upon the consent of the governed. I never consented that anybody should be above me in the eye of the law, and never asked that anybody should be below me. If society is formed by the voluntary surrender of equality, it is difficult to see how its lower ranks have become filled. I can understand the voluntary assumption of power, but not the voluntary abnegation.

A disposition to cavil about small matters might prompt the inquiry by what process inalienable rights are bargained away in the formation of government, and also why they should be bargained away, since Government is formed to preserve them; but let these things pass. The gentleman considers society as the foundation of inequality of human rights. In my simplicity I had thought that the arrangement by which some men are deputed to make and carry out laws no more makes these men higher or better than their neighbors than does the corresponding arrangement by which some men shave and others are shaved render the two classes unequal. The man who holds a law over my head may be in a position to be feared; so may the man who holds a razor at my throat, but I should be slow to acknowledge superiority on this account, either in the law-maker or the barber.

I had thought that public servants, like all other servants, are at least no better than those they serve; that the term usually applied to them is not a mere catchword to be used just before elections for the purpose of flattering and deluding the simple minded, but that it really contains an honest meaning. The gentleman thinks government makes men unequal by deputing some to rule and others to obey, and that the former are the superior and the latter the inferior class. If this should be found true in theory, I doubt very much whether practice, at least in this country, would not contradict it. The gentleman himself may be better, wiser, and nobler than those who sent him here. I am not competent to judge between him and his constituents, but I am not prepared to consent that the people of the rest of my native State should be judged by any such standard.

I have the most profound respect for the legal opinions of my learned colleague when I can be sure they are not influenced by his prejudices of rank and caste; but I must be permitted to doubt his capacity to judge or even comprehend a question which involves a comparison of himself with other men. Some people have a peculiar obliquity of moral vision which prevents them from looking upon other human beings in any other direction than downwards.

To return to the bill in question, I have probably said enough to satisfy my colleague that he must not expect my assistance in passing it; but I will venture a few suggestions for the purpose of perfecting his scheme. If his object is to curtail the power of the people by circumscribing that of their representatives and to place the Government in the hands of an irresponsible body, as may be reasonably inferred from the language of the bill, I can assure him the measure he proposes will only produce a partial success. True, with it the people can no longer through their representatives enact laws except with the permission of the President and the Supreme Court. But they can still, to some extent, control the President by choosing his electors once in four years. This is a fatal defect, but it is not without remedy. Let me suggest one. The Constitution provides no means to settle contested cases of elections of electors. That process would seem to be left to be devised by Congress, but as yet no legislation has been had on the subject. It is not impossible nor improbable that very soon there may be two antagonistic sets of electors from each of the ten States now undergoing reconstruction, and the Fortieth Congress may be called upon to decide, or provide the means for deciding, which in each case shall be counted. Indeed, if each political party shall nominate its leading general the determination of this question may make either Grant or Lee our next President. How admirably it would comport with the project now under consideration to submit this question to the decision of the Supreme Court. Why not add a section to the present bill empowering the Supreme Court to decide contested elections of electors? If with this additional aid the President and the Supreme Court do not at some time in the future achieve permanence in office and complete irresponsible and despotic power, then American ambition must be made of different material from that of the Old World in times past.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman, although I feel very competent to reply now and here to everything which has been advanced by my colleague, yet I think it would be indecorous in me to make an instant reply to an indictment which has been drawn so carefully and elaborately as that which he has read from his manuscript to these almost empty benches. I propose, therefore, after due deliberation, to put in my answer to this bill of indictment. I suppose the accusation and bill have some great object in view. I confess I do not see what that object is, but it does not become me to inquire. I propose at the next opportunity, when the House is in the Committee of the Whole, to make as formal a reply to the gentleman as he has made his attack on me.

Meanwhile, there is one single point in what he has advanced to which I wish to allude now. The gentleman insinuated, almost said, that in a late speech which I had the honor to submit in this House certain expressions that are found in the published report were not delivered. The insinuation is—and so I suppose it is intended to go out to the country—that I caused to be printed something that was not in the speech I delivered. Now, the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. MYERS,] who took some notice of the point at the time, had the candor to concede that every word that was printed was on the paper before me, and every word was delivered down to perhaps the very last sentence on that paper. When the Speaker's hammer fell, and my time was said to be exhausted, the gentleman and those who acted with him refused to allow me time enough to finish that sentence. The manuscript with that unfinished sentence was then passed over into the hands of the reporters, and I have never seen it since.

The intimation, therefore, is false and slanderous that something was inserted in the Globe that was not delivered here. Every word was delivered that my time allowed me to deliver, and every word that was not spoken was passed into the hands of the reporters, and has never been seen by me since except in print. That is the fact in regard to the delivery of the speech. It is, therefore, unkind and unjust in any gentleman to insinuate that I published in the Globe a speech that I did not deliver here. There was not a word of the speech published in the Globe that was not on my written manuscript, and nearly every sentence in it, certainly every paragraph in it, was actually delivered, and I was in the act of completing the last paragraph when I was cut off by the fall of the hammer.

Now, I trust, as my colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. MYERS] did me the justice at the time to concede the fact as I have stated it now, that my colleague from the Delaware district [Mr. BROOMALL] will not make himself unhappy in the future about the matter.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will state that I listened to the speech of the gentleman. I certainly did not hear the part I have quoted; I am not quite sure that I listened to all he delivered, but my information on the subject was derived in this way: the remarks were not heard by many, and—

Mr. WOODWARD. They were not delivered. They were the very last words of the speech, and they were not spoken.

Mr. BROOMALL. That is my recollection. I was afraid I had done my colleague injustice. But I remember that the next morning there was considerable discussion on this side of the House about moving a resolution of censure, and the answer was, "Why, those remarks were not delivered in the House, and we cannot censure him."

Mr. WOODWARD. The fact is just this: I had the last sheet of paper of my notes in my hand, and I was delivering it just as rapidly as I could deliver it when the hammer fell. The hammer fell, I think, in the middle of the last sentence on that page; certainly in the midst of the last paragraph.

Mr. BROOMALL. And before the remarks that I quoted.

Mr. WOODWARD. The remarks you have quoted were the very last remarks on the last page of my speech.

Mr. BROOMALL. And were not delivered.

Mr. WOODWARD. That was the reason why they were not actually pronounced. As I said before, the hammer fell while I was in the act of delivering them. I handed the notes over to the reporter, and I have not seen them since that time.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have not the smallest reason to call any of this in question.

Mr. WOODWARD. Now, as this is a small matter of fact, I would like to have it correctly ascertained. The truth is, as I understood—I am a new member here—the House frequently gives a member, when he has not time enough to finish his speech, leave to print it in the Globe. I supposed that under that general regulation I had a right to hand over to the reporters my entire notes. If my attention had been called to the subject at the moment I, perhaps, would have struck out that part of the paragraph which I had not yet actually got out of my mouth; but my attention was not called to it. In the course of business my notes passed over into the hands of the reporters, and I thought no more of the matter until my colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. MYERS] undertook to arraign me about it, and, upon an explanation, he admitted that it was all on the written paper, and if there is any doubt about it the reporters will verify it.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have no reason to question it.

Mr. WOODWARD. If you will look at the original notes, you will find that what I have stated is exactly the fact of the case.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have no reason to question it. I think I have said nothing in my remarks that would contradict that.

Mr. WOODWARD. Yes, your remarks insinuate that I got into the Globe that which I had not delivered here.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is not that the fact?

Mr. WOODWARD. Well, it is not true in the sense in which you put it forward. It is not true in that sense. If the full facts that I have explained had been stated I should have had nothing to complain of.

Mr. Chairman, I have explained this single point in the gentleman's remarks. On some future occasion I propose to refer to other things which he has said.

Mr. MYERS. I do not know that there is any necessity of my saying anything. My speech I suppose is what my colleague alludes to, and my speech is on record.

Mr. WOODWARD. I yield now for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BOYER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. COVONE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WOODBRIDGE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. PERHAM, (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of the Rocky Mountain Railroad and Telegraph Company, for aid in the construction of said road.

By Mr. BURR: The petition of J. D. Stockton, formerly sergeant company B, third regiment Arkansas cavalry, praying bounty.

By Mr. PHELPS: A memorial of iron manufacturers and civil engineers, of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for legislation to secure the engineer and other staff corps of the Navy against unjust discrimination.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut: The petition of sundry citizens of Rochester, New York, in behalf of Dorrance Atwater, praying for his relief from conviction by court-martial.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 13, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's legislative proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate adjourn until Saturday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us dispose of the morning business first.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish the Senator from Minnesota would allow me to make some reports.

Mr. RAMSEY. I make the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark that he has an accumulation of documents on his table which he has had no opportunity to place before the Senate. They ought to be placed before the Senate at some time.

Mr. SUMNER. They can be presented at some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, that the Senate adjourn until Saturday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. That motion is debatable, I believe. I have a word to say about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will vote it down.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 262) authorizing certain distilled spirits to be turned over to the Surgeon General for the use of Army hospitals;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 180) declaring the meaning of the acts relating to the Pacific railroad; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the General of the Army, which was read:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution of date December 5, 1867, calling upon me for a statement of the number of white and colored voters registered in each of the States subject to the reconstruction acts of Congress, the number of white and colored voters voting for and against the calling of a convention, and as far as practicable the number of white and colored persons disfranchised and rendered incompetent by the reconstruction acts to vote for a convention, and the number of white persons entitled to be registered but who did not apply for registration. Not having the facts necessary to enable me to furnish the statement required, I referred the resolution to the several district commanders for the information called for so far as related to their several districts; and in answer thereto I respectfully submit herewith their several reports.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT, General.

Hon. B. F. WADE, President United States Senate.

The communication, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating a report of the Quartermaster General of the Army, supplementary to the report communicated on the 6th of April, containing a list of cases of differences of settlement of claims between the Quartermaster General and the accounting officers of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, of the 21st of April, communicating a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in relation to additional accommodations for the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, of the 17th of April, in relation to the necessity of providing additional accommodations for the use of the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating a report of Special Indian Agent Alexander R. Banks, containing a statement of the destitute condition of various Indian tribes in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating copies of letters from Messrs. Stellawer & Osborn, relative to furnishing supplies to destitute friendly Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to be made at an early day for the purpose of subsisting friendly Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating information relative to the destitution prevailing among the Sioux Indians near Devil's Lake, Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONSTITUTIONS OF SOUTH CAROLINA, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the constitution of the State of South Carolina, and also the constitution of the State of Florida, adopted by the constitutional conventions recently held in those States under the reconstruction laws; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Denver Board of Trade, Colorado Territory, praying for the right of way and a grant of lands to aid in the construction of the Denver, South Park, and Rio Grande Railroad and Telegraph Company; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Denver, South Park, and Rio Grande Railroad and Telegraph Company, praying for the right of way and a grant of land to aid in the construction of their road; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Rocky Mountain Railroad and Telegraph Company, praying to be allowed the right of way through the public lands and a donation of lands to aid in the construction of their railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, in favor of further provisions of law for the security of life in vessels and steamboats navigating the lakes and rivers within the jurisdiction of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a letter of the Governor of Pennsylvania, communicating a copy of an act of the Legislature of that State entitled

"An act supplementary to an act to incorporate the Soldiers' National Cemetery, approved March 25, 1864," providing for ceding that cemetery to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of Mrs. Emma M. Moore, widow of Lieutenant John W. Cox, of the United States Navy, and of the late Senior Captain E. W. Moore, of the late Texas navy, praying that her name may be restored to the pension list; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Albert Woodcock, praying that pensions be granted to the surviving soldiers in the war of 1812; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Gottlieb Oesterle, praying payment of bounty, back pay, and clothing, which he alleges to be due him; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of Samuel F. Crawford, praying to be granted a land warrant for certain land in Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Alabama, praying the admission of Alabama as a State into the Union; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, protesting against the acts of Congress commonly called the reconstruction acts, and against the passage of the bill requiring the concurrence of two thirds of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States to pronounce an act unconstitutional, and the bill to take from the Supreme and other courts of the United States jurisdiction in cases arising under the reconstruction acts; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of W. F. Durisoe, praying to be relieved of civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of E. G. Platt, remonstrating against the Pawnee school fund being placed in the hands of the Methodist conference; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of commissioners to manage the Yosemite valley and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, protesting against the action of the Legislature of California in granting a certain portion of the Yosemite valley to J. C. Lamon and J. M. Hutchins; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a resolution of the Mechanics' State Council of California, in favor of the passage of the bill fixing eight hours as a legal day's work; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Stewart Harrison, praying to be relieved of civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of a committee of the American Medical Association, praying the enactment of a law which will secure to the members of the medical and surgical staff of the Navy an equal distribution of prize money; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of W. O. Law, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of citizens of Washington, in the District of Columbia, praying that the Center market may be removed from the present location to the space between Tenth and Twelfth streets north of the canal; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, on the subject of inadequacy of the post office building in the city of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. YATES presented a petition of members of the bar at Salt Lake city, in the Territory of Utah, praying for the passage of an act to provide for holding a term of the United States district court for that Territory in that place; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the establishment of a mail route with daily service from Portland, via Taylor's Ferry, Dayton, Amity, Richereal, and Monmouth, to Corvallis; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the memorial of Quincy A. Brooks, special agent of the Post Office Department, recommending the establishment of a post route from Dallas to Grand Round, in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a memorial of citizens of Chicago, praying for an appropriation for the enlargement of the St. Mary's ship-canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILLEY presented petitions of citizens of Virginia, producers, dealers, and consumers of articles required in tanning and dyeing, praying that a small specific duty be imposed on sumac imported from foreign countries; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented the petition of A. L. Core, late collector of the second internal revenue district of Virginia, praying that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may be authorized to settle with him on equitable principles; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CORBETT presented a petition of citizens of Boise City, in the Territory of Idaho, praying the passage of an act confirming the entry heretofore made of the land which is the site of that city, and otherwise confirming the title of individual owners of lots in that city; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio. I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution relative to requesting Congress to take measures to prevent the loss of life on the waters under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Whereas the frequent appalling disasters on our lakes and rivers, by explosions and conflagrations, whereby the loss of human life in its most terrible forms has become absolutely shocking; Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to make further provisions by law, at as early a period as practicable, for the security of life in vessels and steamboats navigating the lakes and rivers within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Resolved, That copies of the foregoing resolution be sent by the Governor to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JOHN F. FOLLETT,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Adopted April 25, 1888.

T. J. GODFREY,

President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that that resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present another resolution from the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, and ask that it be read and lie on the table. It is rather an extraordinary resolution, but I feel it my duty to present it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution protesting against the reconstruction acts of Congress and against the passage of certain bills now pending therein, and instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to vote for the repeal of the former and against the passage of the latter.

Whereas the Congress of the United States has enacted laws and is now considering measures which if enacted into laws are, in the opinion of this General Assembly, in direct conflict with the plainest provisions of the Constitution; Therefore,

Be it resolved, 1. That this General Assembly doth protest against the acts of Congress commonly called the reconstruction acts, because the same are subversive of the rights of the States, the liberty and prosperity of the people, and the constitutional powers of the executive and judicial departments of the Federal Government, and our Senators in Congress are hereby instructed, and our Representatives in Congress requested, to vote for the repeal of all said acts.

2. That this General Assembly doth protest against the passage of the bill now pending in Congress requiring the concurrence of two thirds of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States to pronounce an act of Congress unconstitutional, because said proposition is plainly unconstitutional, and is an attempt to destroy the judicial department of the Government.

3. And this General Assembly doth also protest against the passage of the bill now pending in Congress, to take from the Supreme Court and other courts of the United States jurisdiction in cases arising under said reconstruction acts, because said bill proposes to deny to the people any redress for wrongs and injuries they may suffer, to destroy the just and necessary powers of the judicial tribunals, and to subject the country to an uncontrolled and uncontrollable military despotism; and our Senators in Congress are hereby instructed, and our Representatives in Congress requested, to oppose and vote against the passage of said bills.

4. That the Governor is hereby requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to each of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

JOHN F. FOLLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
J. C. LEE,
President of the Senate.

Adopted April 13, 1868.

The resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. COLE presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of California, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of San Diego, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of California, praying Congress to grant aid to the Orville and Virginia City Railroad Company in the building and completion of its road from Orville, in the county of Butte, California, up Feather river, by the way of Beckworth's pass, to Virginia City, in the State of Nevada; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the vote in the nature of a memorial of the town of Littleton, New Hampshire, in favor of taxing United States bonds and of applying the proceeds of the tax in payment of the national debt; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THAYER presented a petition of Hannah Cook, widow of Lyman N. Cook, a pensioner of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, in favor of an appropriation for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to give notice that on some future day I shall ask leave to introduce a bill to enable the people of the Territory of Colorado to form a constitution, with a view to the admission of that Territory as a State into the Union.

I also give notice that I shall ask leave to introduce a bill for the same purpose in relation to the Territory of Montana.

RESIGNATION OF SECRETARY FORNEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letter; which was read:

WASHINGTON, May 12, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to resign the office of Secretary of the Senate, to take effect the moment my successor is elected.

Yours, very respectfully, J. W. FORNEY.
Hon. B. F. WADE, President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that paper lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table unless objection be made.

Mr. CAMERON. I object to that course. I move that the resignation be accepted.

Mr. SUMNER. My motion, I think, is in order. I move that it lie on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose there is no objection to its going on the table, and then I have a resolution to offer on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the paper lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resignation of the Secretary of the Senate be accepted, and that until a successor be elected William J. McDonald discharge the duties of the office.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of resignation was laid on the table. It must be taken up before anything can be done with it.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It does not make any difference where the resignation is; it is a fact; that fact does not disappear from the knowledge of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Is debate in order now? I objected to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If any objection is made, the resolution cannot be considered at this time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not debating; I am making a suggestion on the question of order ruled by the Chair that the fact of the resignation having gone upon the table has some effect, what, I did not understand, upon the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. But I objected to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rules.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 262) concerning district judges, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 230) authorizing writs of error from the circuit to the district courts of the United States in certain criminal cases, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 178) to remove the disability of certain citizens of Alabama, to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute containing one hundred and six names of persons recommended to be relieved from disabilities. In making this report I am further instructed by the committee to state that those names which are omitted from the substitute were not passed upon adversely, but were omitted because it was impossible to get sufficient information in regard to them on which to found any action. I will state that there is great difficulty in obtaining information with regard to persons who ought to be relieved from disabilities in those States. However, when those States shall be represented here we can more readily get information; but it is believed that the persons whose names are contained in the substitute are deserving of the action of Congress relieving them from disabilities, and it is presumed that there are many others in Alabama equally entitled, but not having the facts before us we were unable to pass upon them.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. A similar resolution was introduced in the Senate some time ago, but failed to pass; and I ask to have this resolution put upon its passage. The parties are waiting to have the work done. The resolution has the approval of the Secretary of War, and I ask to have it put upon its passage.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will not that lead to some debate?

Mr. WILSON. No; not at all.

Mr. RAMSEY. There is some other morning business that ought to be disposed of.

Mr. WILSON. This will not take a moment. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution at the present time. Is there any objection?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, have considered the same and instructed me to report it back without amendment, and if there is no objection I will ask the present consideration of the bill. There seems to be an urgent necessity, as represented by General Meade, that the bill should be immediately acted upon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would rather see it. Let it lie over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Objection being made, of course it goes over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes over under the rule.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five hundred additional copies of the report upon the accounts of the Secretary of the Senate, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. The papers have gone to the Printing Office, and I am not able to present them with the report; but the cost will be about twenty-five dollars.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 406) providing for the holding of courts in the Territories belonging to the United States, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, in favor of the removal of Robert B. Mitchell from the position of Governor of that Territory, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following petitions, memorials, and resolution, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A petition of the Virginia constitutional convention, praying the adoption of measures that will protect loyal men in the exercise of the elective franchise;

A memorial of delegates in the Georgia State constitutional convention, praying that the convention may be authorized to institute a civil provisional government in that State;

A resolution of the constitutional convention of Georgia, urging Congress to authorize that body to declare vacant the chief executive office of that State, and to fill the same;

A memorial of the constitutional convention of the State of Mississippi, asking Congress to authorize that body to declare vacant all civil offices in the provisional government of that State, and to fill the same;

A petition of citizens of Boston and Roxbury, Massachusetts, praying an amendment to the Constitution abolishing the Presidency;

A petition of citizens of Michigan, praying the abolition of the Presidency;

Two petitions of citizens of the United States, praying the abolition of the Presidency; and

A memorial of members of the constitutional convention of Arkansas, praying that the reconstruction conventions in the several States be empowered by act of Congress to organize a provisional government.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the letter of the Attorney General in relation to the case of Lucius P. Bryan, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying a change in the mode of appointments and removals of officers selected to execute the laws for the collection or disbursement of moneys, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the joint select Committee on Retrenchment; which was agreed to.

CODIFICATION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the commissioners appointed under the act of June 27, 1866, "to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statute laws of the United States," be requested to report to the Senate what progress has been made by them and how much time will be required to complete the work.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that resolution from a committee?

Mr. TRUMBULL. From the Judiciary Committee, asking the revisers to report to the Senate. I think we ought to have some information on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I think so.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPORT ON MINING.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer a resolution, which I desire to have referred, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the same number of copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing the report of James W. Taylor upon gold and silver mines and mining east of the Rocky mountains, be printed for the use of the Senate as are ordered of the report of J. Ross Browne on the mineral resources of the Pacific States and Territories; and that said reports be bound together.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say a word in regard to that resolution. There has been no resolution yet presented in the Senate, that I know of, for the printing of J. Ross Browne's report. Indeed, the report has never been sent in to this body by the Secretary of the Treasury. That officer does not appear to regard this body as of sufficient consequence to receive the report. I am in hopes that we shall get it at some time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to ask the Senator from California how it comes to be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to present that report to the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. The law provides that the report shall be made under his direction; and if it is to be printed by the Senate it cannot be taken cognizance of by the Senate unless sent here officially.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand that he was responsible for it at all.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator need not be in such haste to defend his Secretary. If my purpose was to attack that honorable functionary I should do it on more salient points than the failure to send in a report. That was not my purpose this morning; but it was simply to state a fact. I hope the resolution will go to the Committee on Mines and Mining, where the report itself will go when it shall be sent in.

Mr. RAMSEY. I was under the impression that the report had been received here. It has certainly been received in one of the Houses; I suppose the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONNESS. There are two Houses. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. RAMSEY. Of course I have no objection to that if the paper is not here.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is very desirable, I think, that both reports should be published; and if the one made by Mr. Browne has not been sent to us, I think it would be better to pass a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit it. As the law now stands I do not think he is under any obligation to send it to us; and if he is not under any obligation to send it, of course he is not liable to censure for not having done so. But it ought to be before us, and I submit to my friend from California that he had better offer a resolution calling upon the Secretary to send the paper.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not offer that resolution. I agree with the honorable Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury does not feel obliged to send that report here. I have a recollection of a somewhat memorable occasion in which he denounced this body as a body of Constitution-tinkers. Nevertheless, I hope to get the report in some way or other, when I will take steps to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from California that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. RAMSEY. There seems to be no propriety in that, as it has reference entirely to printing; but if the report is not here, the resolutions may lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will offer a resolution, if the Senate will indulge me, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to send the paper to us. The Clerk can put it in writing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to that. It has already been sent to the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, to refer the resolution to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 135) to restore Alabama, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Florida to representation in Congress; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 134) authorizing a change of mail service between Fort Abercrombie and Helena; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 478) to amend an act entitled "An act for the removal of the Sisseton, Warpeton, Medawakanton, and Warpekata bands of Sioux or Dakota Indians, and for the disposition of their lands in Minnesota and Dakota," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 479) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail service by American steamships between the United States and the north and south of Europe, and between the United States and the Mediterranean ports of Asia and Africa; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 480) to provide for the change of name or location of national banking associations; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask the consent of the Senator from Ohio, and the unanimous consent of the Senate, to allow me to have taken up a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to establish the office of register of deeds for the District of Columbia," and I will state the reason why I make this request. There is no officer in existence who can perform the duties of that office, the incumbent having died, and the law not providing for any substitute in any way. The bill provides for a temporary appointment until a permanent appointment can be made. I make this statement because I do not wish to take the personal responsibility of the confusion that may arise in that office on account of there being no person legally qualified to perform its duties.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the register has been dead about six months, and that there really is but very little difference whether the deeds are recorded now or a few days hence; while I regard the passage of the bill which has been taken up on my motion as indispensable to the safety and peace and order of society in Arkansas, which now is in a peculiar state, with a Legislature in session without authority. I think we ought not to delay for a moment action upon this bill. I therefore would not be willing to consent that it should be laid aside. I hope it will pass with very little debate, and without opposition. The people of Arkansas have complied with every condition required of them, and they are entitled, according to the terms of existing law, to admission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The bill mentioned by the Senator from Iowa can be proceeded with only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The bill was read. The preamble recites that the people of Arkansas, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, have framed and adopted a constitution of State government which is republican in form, and that the Legislature of the State has duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen. The bill therefore proceeds to enact that the State of Arkansas is entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as one of the States of the Union upon the fundamental condition that the constitution of Arkansas shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I desire merely to make an inquiry. I see that this bill states several facts, such as the ratification of the constitutional amendment by the Legislature and the adoption of a republican constitution. I suppose it is so; I think I have understood from the papers that such is the fact. It is very gratifying to me that it is so, and I shall be very glad not only to see Arkansas, but all the other States that were recently in rebellion, represented in this body at the earliest practicable moment consistent with the safety of the country. I do not know that I have any sort of objection to this bill. I suppose that I am for it. I, however, have not looked at the bill; but it is a very important measure, and I rose merely to inquire whether the Committee on Finance, of which the Senator from Ohio is chairman, has examined this bill. I was not aware that that committee had had the matter under consideration; and if not, what committee does it come from, and whether it has been examined at all, or whether the Senator from Ohio proposes on the statement of an individual Senator to pass a bill of this kind. I have no doubt if that Senator makes any statement it will be entirely correct; but I desire to know if he proposes to establish in this body as the proper mode of proceeding that so important a measure as the recognition of a State government in one of the rebel States that we have been disturbed about for several years should be passed by this body without a reference to any committee or any examination as to the facts. I should myself be entirely satisfied with any statement the Senator from Ohio made; but I submit to him whether the practice is one that had better be adopted in the Senate of passing so important a bill as this without a reference to any committee. He knows as well as any member of the Senate how disagreeable it is for any one to object to the statements made by a Senator. The Senator from Ohio may be entirely accurate in the statements he proposes to make, and if he makes them he will think that he is; and yet it is barely possible, where a matter has not been investigated, that he may labor under a mistake. It is a very important measure, and I suggest to him whether it is proper to pass such a bill without a reference to some committee of the body.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not propose to ask the passage of this bill on any statement of mine. There are only two facts that a committee could ascertain if the bill was referred. This bill has not been referred in the Senate to any committee, certainly not to the Committee on Finance. The ordinary reference would be to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if the Senate are of opinion that this bill ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to ascertain the facts stated, the reference may be made; but there is no necessity for such a reference. I have two official documents before me, one of which contains the proceedings of the Legislature of Arkansas upon the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In this document the proceedings of the Legislature are set out in form, and there was a unanimous vote of both Houses of the Legislature. That one fact is proved to us by a document before us coming to us in the ordinary way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is that document?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is miscellaneous document No. 118. It shows that the constitutional amendment was adopted on Friday, April 3, 1868, in the Hall of Representatives, Little Rock, Arkansas, and in the Senate chamber on the same day, and by a unanimous vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that a Senate document?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; a House document. That was more than a month ago. I have here also a document containing the official copy of the constitution submitted to us by the President of the United States. I have read the constitution over carefully, and any Senator can do so also. There are only one or two points in it on which even Senators could disagree. I think, then, there is no occasion for a reference to ascertain whether this constitution is republican in form. I have here also a letter from the General of the Army, certifying to the election, giving the details of the vote, the controversy about it, and the report of an officer who examined into its regularity.

These are all the facts that any Senator can have upon a reference to the Judiciary Committee, and they rest upon official documents, and not upon any statement I could make. I could, from the paper I hold in my hand and from personal information derived from private sources, make statements in regard to the condition of affairs in Arkansas to show the indispensable necessity of immediate action on this bill; and that is the only point on which I would detain the Senate for a moment. The official reports communicated to us by the General of the Army show a condition of society in Arkansas, in the absence of civil law, of local law, of authorized constables, sheriffs, &c., demanding immediate action. The Legislature of Arkansas is now in session, but their statutes have no force until Congress approve and ratify the constitution under the reconstruction acts.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. SHERMAN. May 4, 1868. I will not stop to give these facts to the Senate unless there is a necessity for them; but, so far as the facts upon which we admit Arkansas are concerned, they are of record here before us by documents coming to us from the President of the United States, from the General of the Army, and from the Legislature of Arkansas showing their approval of the constitutional amendment. If there is any other fact stated in the preamble or in the body of the bill that is not established by the highest official record, I do not know what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. When did the President send it here?

Mr. SHERMAN. May 4, 1868.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the course advised by my friend from Ohio is adopted it will be the first instance in which a measure of that kind has been passed by the Senate in that way. I suppose there are not a dozen members of the Senate who have read the constitution which came to us, as the Senator says, by a message dated on the 4th of this month. At that time we were engaged in the trial which is still undecided. That trial occupied, and I believe engrossed, the attention of almost every member of the Senate. Little other business was done or thought of, and, speaking for myself, little other business of any importance is thought of now. It may be true that a state of things exists in Arkansas which it would be very desirable to have changed for the better; but a knowledge of that fact we only get, as he tells us, from a letter from the commander of our armies there, in whom I have the greatest confidence both as a gentleman and as a patriotic soldier; but it is not, as I think, advisable, nor do we properly discharge our duty, if we take the statement of any officer as actually true. It may be also true that the constitution adopted by the people of Arkansas conforms to the provisions of the reconstruction acts. It may, therefore, be true that that constitution is republican in form; but these are questions about which gentlemen may well differ, and the only way, as it seems to me, to arrive at a conclusion that would be satisfactory to the Senate and to the country would be to refer it, as has been done in other cases, to the Committee on the Judiciary or to some other committee, if any other committee should be preferred by the Senate.

The bill came before us yesterday for the first time, and now we are asked to ratify a constitution of which very few, if any, members of the Senate, except the honorable member from Ohio, know anything. What possible harm can result from a delay of a few days? Suppose it is postponed to the middle of next week; this, I believe, is Wednesday; suppose it goes over until next Wednesday; does the honorable member suppose there will be many murders perpetrated between now and Wednesday that the adoption of this constitution would prevent; that there will be any acts of injustice to person or to property that the adoption now of the constitution would prevent? I do not see how it can be possible for him to entertain any such apprehension; but I think the country will be surprised if the Senate admit now upon its floor two additional Senators, because, whatever may be the result in the end, the public will say, and have perhaps some reason to speculate upon the result, that those Senators are to constitute a part of the court of impeachment. I take for granted that no member of the body contemplates such a state of things; but if they are admitted they may claim it as a constitutional right, and claiming it as a constitutional right they may be able to satisfy a majority of the Senate that they have that right; and if they succeed in that then their votes are to be heard on that trial.

I repeat that I have no idea, I can have no idea, that any member of the Senate, or any man controlled by a sense of justice, controlled by any, the least, sense of propriety, would have Senators brought in now to take part in the issue of that proceeding; but I only mention it for the purpose of showing that the admission of the State now would cause the public to suspect that that was the purpose, and if they did, such a suspicion would, in my judgment, be derogatory to the character of the Senate. I mention it now only because it may turn out that the Senators themselves will insist upon their right, and they may be able to satisfy, against the wish, against the desire of a majority of the Senate, that they have that right, and thus participate in the judgment. Those dangers are much more pregnant, I think, than any delay of a few days; and why, therefore, can it not be postponed until Tuesday or Wednesday next?

I have nothing more to offer, Mr. President. I submit these considerations with perfect sincerity and with a desire to maintain unsuspected the credit of the Senate and to avoid what, if it does happen, will in the judgment of the country be considered a gross wrong. With this view I oppose the passage of this bill at this time.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Ohio that it is important that this bill should be acted upon at as early a day as the public interests may require, and as the ordinary, usual course of legislation will permit; but I will say to him that I think the bill can more readily and at an earlier day be acted upon finally if it should come here reported by a committee after a reference had been made; for I need not tell him that if action upon it and the consideration of it should be forced on us at this time it would be necessary for Senators to examine it and to discuss it at much greater length than they would be compelled to do if it were reported by a committee. We should then have authentic and official information in regard to it; whereas if it comes up now, we shall be compelled to examine it for ourselves, and to debate it for ourselves, for the purpose of ascertaining the character of the constitution, and also the character of the bill. I must say that I see something in this bill which, I think, would require from me some remark if it were to be acted upon at this time. I should feel desirous of discussing that clause of the bill which provides that no amendment to the constitution shall be made under certain circumstances. I do not know but that that is right; perhaps it is; but I wish to consider whether we can impose a condition precedent in that way prohibiting a State for all time from making what that State may consider a necessary amendment in its constitution with regard to the right of suffrage. I do not know what may be the result of the experiment of universal suffrage of colored men without any limitation of education. In my own State they are not even permitted to vote with education; and it may possibly turn out that it will not seem to be advisable in the southern States to permit them all to vote without being educated in any manner whatever; the proposed constitution may require some amendment. I do not feel at this time prepared to vote on such a proposition. I should like to hear from the committee; I desire to consider it.

Then I have another word to say. The Senator from Maryland has suggested a consideration that these Senators may be called upon to act in the matter of impeachment. He says he has no idea that there is any such intention; but the difficulty is this: I do not know that Senators admitted here now can be prevented from voting; I do not know but that it would be their duty to vote. I cannot say how that would be. They might feel called upon to claim the right. It is said, to be sure, that in this particular case it will make no difference, because the two Senators are said—so I have been told by what I believe to be reliable authority—to differ on that subject. Their vote might make no difference; but how that is I do not know. They may vote on one side; they may vote on the other; they may vote to acquit; they may vote to convict. I have some doubt whether, if they were admitted as Senators, they could be prevented from voting; whether it would not be their duty to act.

Mr. GRIMES. They are not sworn to try the case.

Mr. DIXON. They may ask to be sworn. I do not think we ought to place ourselves in a position where any question of that kind can be raised. We ought not, until this trial is decided, to admit new members of this body and have the question raised whether they ought to be permitted to vote or not. The case is to be decided in a day or two; and it seems to me it would be more decent, more proper for us to delay action upon this bill, if there were no other reason, rather than raise a question as to what may be the duty of the Senators. Of course I do not allude to the side on which they would vote; I do not know; they might vote to acquit; they might vote to convict; they might divide. That is immaterial; that is not the question. If we pass this bill now, and afterward admit these Senators, we are raising a question which ought not to be raised. If that were done perhaps it would be the duty of the new Senators to vote; perhaps we should not have the power to prevent them. In view of that question, therefore, if there were no other reason, I think it would be proper for the Senate to say that this bill should not pass till that great trial is decided. Then justice will be done, of course, by the action of the Senate; the verdict will be acquiesced in; the public will be satisfied, and will presume everything to be right; and, whatever may be the result, peace, I trust, may pervade the whole country. If there were no other reason than that I should be opposed to the passage of this bill at this time. I think it had better be referred to a committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish very positively to disclaim all purpose of calling up this bill to gain two votes on the impeachment trial. I have no idea that the passage of this bill to-day—and I hope the Senate will pass it—would have that effect, because, as we all know, the President of the United States could retain this bill for ten days. In all human probability we shall take a recess on next Monday, and my only purpose in having the bill passed to-day was this: the people of Arkansas would know then that the existing Legislature is a lawful power, that its enactments must be respected, and that they may be enabled, even in anticipation of the final vote on the passage of this bill, with or without the approval of the President, to make the necessary arrangements to preserve law and order in Arkansas. The condition of affairs there now is peculiar. The military authorities are totally inadequate to protect life and property in Arkansas on account of the insufficiency of the force. The present local authority there, growing out of the old debris of civil government, has ceased to have any power whatever. It is not regarded or respected by anybody. Those who formerly adhered to it do not now regard it as having any weight, while the present authority, through the new movement and the existing Legislature, have no legal authority under the reconstruction acts. The reconstruction acts provide that the Legislature shall have no power whatever to pass laws until Congress pass upon their constitution and admit the State; so that there is now an absence of all local authority.

The reports of the registers and judges of election, which are to be found in the report which has been laid upon our tables, disclose a condition of lawlessness and violence in Arkansas such as we ought not to perpetuate for a single day. I have no doubt that every day in Arkansas, in the absence of local authority, murders and outrages are being committed. The official document from General Grant shows, from the reports of officers of the Government, the constant outrages that are being committed there, simply because there is no law, no officer, no constitutional agency to protect the peace and quiet of the people. But the very moment an act is passed by Congress recognizing the existing Legislature as valid, even although it may not be approved by the President, although it may be withheld by him for a time, it will give to their enactments a kind of moral sanction, by the aid of which they will be able to preserve peace and quiet.

If there was any fact disputed or doubted I should be in favor of sending this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary; but there is not. Their proceedings seem to have been regular. The only question that arises is as to the legality of the votes in two counties, Jefferson county and Pulaski county; and that would not change the result. There is no doubt that upon the law the vote was legal, and the officer who was sent to examine into the matter so reported. They acted in those two counties, being populous counties, within easy reach of the telegraph, upon the last amendment of the reconstruction act, and allowed all persons to vote, whether they were registered in those counties or in other counties of the State. In that I think they acted according to the strict letter of the law, and it was perfectly right and proper.

Under these circumstances, to prolong this matter seems to me unwise. I was in hopes that the Senate would, without objection, with great unanimity, pass this bill. It cannot effect any political object. These men cannot come here to vote upon impeachment. It can do no harm. It may protect life and property a little sooner. There is no doubt at all, I think, of the passage of this bill within a week or two. I see no reason why the Senate, which is proverbial for delay, should in this case, where no good can come from delay and a great deal of harm may come, delay this matter until next week or the week after. It is for the Senate to say. I think we ought to act upon it now. I feel the more anxious on this subject because persons whom I know, who have cast their fortunes in Arkansas, write to me that the condition of society there absolutely demands some moral support at least from a local government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope this bill will be referred to the proper committee in the regular way. I have looked at the constitution casually, and I believe it to be right; I believe it will turn out on investigation that every step has been regular under the law, and that this people may properly and rightly and legally, according to the constitution and the reconstruction laws, be received: but I believe that it is of great consequence as a rule for the orderly administration of government, that the usual course as to a bill of this importance, not merely to this people, but to the whole country, as a precedent of the method of readmitting old States or reorganizing and admitting new ones, should be adhered to with regularity. It is undoubtedly true, as my friend from Ohio says, that there is a state of things in the State of Arkansas that earnestly appeals to our sense of such expedition as we can consistently and properly make; and the same state of things exists, I am sorry to say, in most of the other southern States, according to my information; and as to them, too, I would make all the haste consistent with justice and consistent with security. But I believe it will be an unparalleled and unprecedented step for this body to take, looking back to the records of the worst "Democratic" times—I use the word Democratic in its modern and not in its proper signification—for us to admit a State into this Union, or readmit an old one whose relations have been disturbed, which is practically the same thing, without any reference to a committee, without having before us in the regular and proper way those official and other facts upon which the body are to act. It is true that by the courtesy between the two Houses we have had sent to us in an informal manner the print of this constitution, the print of the letter to the President, and of his message to that body.

Mr. SHERMAN. I got them from our document room.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say we have had them sent to us in the regular way of the courtesy between the two Houses; that is, when one House orders a document printed for its own use, as it does under the rules, a certain number of copies are sent to the other House for distribution among its members for their information; but in an official sense they are not here. That, I admit, is a technical objection; but I say when we are entering upon legislation of this character, which affects so many interests and such wide areas of country, we ought to be careful, even for the sake of public opinion, in order to defy the criticism of our opponents, that every step of regularity shall be adhered to; and we ought not to be told, when those who complain of our action go back to the people, that we have hastied a measure through here without any reference to a committee, in plain violation of and departure from the spirit of our rules and without a precedent or a parallel.

I say, therefore, looking at it in the mere sense of party expediency, and in what some would call that narrower party sense that appeals to the political wisdom of Republicans, that we ought to put ourselves in a position to defy criticism here or elsewhere. If it be claimed by anybody on this floor that there is any doubt about the regularity of these proceedings, let them go to a committee, and let him be challenged to produce his objections and his evidence, if he has any; and then, in a day or two or three, your committee will report back the facts, and then we can pass the bill.

Suppose it were passed to-day, Mr. President, and suppose—I think I shall not be guilty of any impropriety if I refer to it, because it is within the range of probabilities—suppose it should happen that passing this bill to-day it should be sent to the President to-morrow, and that on Saturday that President should be removed from office, has his successor a constitutional right, or is he bound by constitutional duty, to examine and approve that bill? According to my judgment, by no manner of means. Therefore, I think we can subserve no practical purpose, we can subserve no legal or regular purpose, by hastening a bill of this importance, the first of the series of bills which is to operate upon these States, and also upon Territories, through in this way. I hope it will be sent to a committee.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I simply desire to call attention to one question of fact. I shall vote to refer this subject to a committee, because I desire a report from them on the question arising from the face of these papers of whether this Constitution was in fact adopted or not.

The Senator from Ohio seems to rest under a mistake in regard to the time when information of the act of the 11th of March reached the State of Arkansas so as to be acted upon at an election. We passed an act, the Senate will remember, which bears date the 11th of March, authorizing persons registered in one part of the State to vote in other parts of the State, being there, I believe, a period of ten days. The law before that was understood not to permit that. The Senator seemed to think that information of that law had reached the State of Arkansas and was acted upon in the two counties where there were a large number of surplus votes, and although they had no official copy of the law, they had information by dispatch from the General-in-Chief upon which, in point of fact, they acted, and these votes were taken. Now, sir, the fact is not so, as I understand the report of General Gillem. He says:

"The order containing this law"—

Meaning the law of the 11th of March—

"was not received until after the election."

Mr. SHERMAN. Received by him.

Mr. BUCKALEW. He says:

"The order containing this law was not received until after the election, and the dispatch from the General-in-Chief containing no intimation of this provision"—

To wit, the provision permitting electors to vote in a different part of the State—

"I was unaware of the existence of the law, and therefore prescribed no regulations for persons voting at other precincts than those in which they registered."

The paragraph above is as follows:

"Prior to the act of Congress passed March 11, 1868, and which was promulgated in General Order No. 14 from the War Department, dated March 14, 1868, there was no law or order in existence permitting voters registered in one county or precinct to vote in any other county or precinct."

And he goes on then and explains the law. He states, I believe, in another part of his report, that there was a dispatch from General Grant announcing the fact of the passage of the law, but he says that in the first information which he received there was no intimation of this particular provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to read the information upon which I base my statement?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. He reads from the report of General Gillem, who has been all the time at Vicksburg, but the report of the officer, Colonel Tourtelotte, who was sent by General Gillem to examine into the regularity of this election, shows as follows, on page 23:

"No fraud by registrars appears to have been intended in this matter, as they allowed persons elsewhere registered to vote only after mutual consultation and consideration of act of Congress passed March 11, 1868, but their conduct was very unfortunate, as the registration law was thus virtually impaired."

But the registrars acted upon consultation in obedience to the law, having received intelligence of it before the election came off, and I think they acted clearly right.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think that the statement to which the Senator refers ought to be compared with the other official information in this document. I shall not take the time of the Senate to refer to several other points, as I have not had leisure and opportunity to collate and compare the different matters; but, clearly, upon this dispatch of the general, who is responsible for his report, and who is the authorized officer to communicate to us the result, it would seem that in point of fact there was no order or authority by which votes could be taken under the act of the 11th of March, and if any election officer proceeded to take such votes it was without any legal regulation or any legal authority.

Now, sir, another statement which is made by one of the subordinate officers, and, I believe, adopted by the general, is that it cannot be ascertained on which side these surplus voters in the two counties cast their ballots. It will be seen by referring to the table of returns that the number of negative votes in Pulaski county is a great deal less than these surplus votes. I believe the whole number of negative votes given in that county is not more than about one half the total number of surplus votes recorded in the two counties. Certainly, sir, some committee ought to examine these matters of fact and report to us that there is a satisfactory showing that this constitution was in point of fact adopted by a majority of the electors of that State.

Mr. MORTON. No one, Mr. President, is more anxious than myself to have the Senators and Representatives from Arkansas admitted without further delay. There are two very excellent gentlemen present to-day elected Senators from Arkansas, whom I shall be very glad to take by the hand and welcome into this body. The evidence in the hands of the Senator from Ohio, and referred to by him, I take to be entirely satisfactory and sufficient to show that the conditions provided in the reconstruction acts have been fully complied with by Arkansas; that she has formed a constitution that is republican in its character and form; that her Legislature has ratified the constitutional amendment; and that Arkansas is now in a condition to be represented in Congress again.

Nor do I see the necessity of referring this matter to a committee. The evidence is in a nutshell. It is a matter of public notoriety with which we are all acquainted. The official evidence is present in the Senate, and can be read in twenty minutes. But feeling as I do, I think there is, perhaps, an impropriety in attempting to pass this bill to-day; and, for one, I should prefer to see it lie over until Monday, and then I think it can be passed in a very short time. The character of the argument made this morning by the Senator from Maryland shows to me what use will be made of the passage of the bill to-day, or an attempt to pass it to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member does not mean to say that I would use it for any such purpose, but that it would be used.

Mr. MORTON. I did not understand the Senator from Maryland as saying that it would be used for such a purpose, but that it might be; and the character of the speech was certainly calculated to make that impression upon the country. The same thing was substantially reiterated or stated by the Senator from Connecticut. Now, sir, as a simple matter of fact, the admission of Arkansas to-day, or the passage of the bill, could not be used upon the question of impeachment one way or the other; and I am sure there is no intention of that character. But, sir, in view of the present condition of affairs and of the events that are impending, I am opposed to any legislation in the Senate to-day, and I am in favor of adjourning the Senate over until next Saturday at half past eleven o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. Make that motion.

Mr. MORTON. If it is in order, I will make the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until half past eleven o'clock on Saturday; and if that is adopted, I shall then move to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent. Is there any objection to putting the question?

Mr. DAVIS. I want to say a word on the reference of this subject.

Mr. CONNESS. Let that motion be first put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn to a certain time is not in order now. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SUMNER. I would ask if a motion to postpone the pending order, in order to put that motion, would not be in order.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a Senator on the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a question before the Senate, and another motion cannot be entertained except by unanimous consent until that is disposed of.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the Senator from Kentucky is willing to have the question put.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand by what right the Senator from Massachusetts gets up to deprive me of the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all; I beg the Senator's pardon; it was a misunderstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. If we are to have a vote now I am willing to omit saying anything on the question of adjournment, or any other question.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. DAVIS. But I do not consult the Senator from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] I will take my seat with a view to the vote being taken.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall not oppose the reference of this bill to a committee if it be thought desirable by any considerable number of the members of the Senate; but I wish to submit a remark or two in relation to points that have been suggested. One is that the votes cast in Arkansas may have been irregular on account of the law not having been published in that State preceding the election. I do not think that that position is tenable. I suppose the moment the bill was approved it became the law of the land; and if the electors in Arkansas acted in pursuance of its provisions their conduct was legal; their votes were legal, whether they knew of the existence of the law or not. It was not necessary that they should know of the existence of the law in order to secure the legality of their conduct. If they had violated a criminal statute they could not have pleaded ignorance of the existence of the law, much less could it be alleged that their conduct, in a civil point of view, as citizens of Arkansas, would be void in the absence of a publication of the law, when there is nothing, either in the law or in the Constitution of the United States, requiring such publication.

Another observation that I desire to make, and the only one, is that if this bill should be passed, and representation from Arkansas be admitted at once, it could only operate favorably to the President of the United States in the trial of the impeachment. It is impossible that it could operate adversely to the party accused if they were admitted to their seats instantly, and should participate in the decision of that question. There are now fifty-four Senators in a full Senate, of which thirty-six affirmative votes are necessary to a conviction and nineteen negative votes are necessary to an acquittal. If two other Senators were admitted there would be fifty-six Senators. One third of fifty-six would be eighteen and two thirds; twice eighteen and two thirds would be thirty-seven and one third; and so it would require thirty-eight votes to convict. One third of fifty-six being eighteen and two thirds, it probably would require nineteen to acquit, and nineteen votes against these articles would acquit the President now. So it is impossible that the admission of Arkansas and the Senators-elect to their seats could operate adversely to the President. I make this statement, which is based on figures that anybody can make, in order to set aside any inference that might possibly be drawn from the suggestions dropped by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to make one further remark, and then I will give the floor to the Senator from Indiana, and that is, that there would seem to be a propriety in admitting these States as rapidly as the law and the facts will permit; for I remember very distinctly one of the President's attorneys complained of the absence of representation from ten States of the Union during the pendency of this trial. Now, to this extent that complaint would be obviated by the admission of representatives from Arkansas before the trial shall have been decided; it would diminish the objection at least one tenth.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Kentucky had the floor and yielded for the purpose of having the motion made, and I now make the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at half past eleven o'clock on Saturday next; and if that is adopted I will then move an adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member waive that motion for a moment to enable me to move to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary? That ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion pending, and no other motion can be entertained until that is disposed of, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall have a vote on the pending question first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will put the question on the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next at half past eleven o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object until we have a vote on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection prevents that motion being put now.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I suggest to my friend from Indiana that he move to postpone the pending order in order to make his motion.

Mr. MORTON. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to postpone the bill under consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for information whether a motion to refer or one to postpone has precedence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone takes precedence.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senate are disposed to acquiesce in postponing this bill until Monday with the understanding that it shall then be taken up and disposed of, I will withdraw my objection to that proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be referred; it can be reported by that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The trouble is that to refer it will create delay.

Mr. JOHNSON and others. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. A single objection puts it over when it is reported: I certainly have no desire not to refer it; but if we adjourn until Saturday it cannot be reported until Saturday, and then a single objection will postpone it beyond the recess.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There will not be any recess.

Mr. POMEROY. It can be reported on Saturday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that when I suggested the propriety of a reference it was not with any view to delay. I certainly have no desire to have the bill postponed until Monday. It was because I thought so important a bill as this should not, for the sake of the example, be permitted to pass this body without a reference to any committee. I will say now to the Senator from Ohio that if this bill be referred I will endeavor to have a meeting of the committee so as to examine it and report it back by the earliest day.

Mr. SHERMAN. By Saturday?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; I should think so.

Mr. SHERMAN. With that suggestion, I have no objection to allowing the bill to be referred.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why not meet on Friday? Several Senators. We cannot meet on Friday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion to postpone?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the bill be referred.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, if that is the desire of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move, then, to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO SATURDAY.

Mr. MORTON. Now I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next at half past eleven o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will modify his motion so as to say until Friday. The committee can meet to-morrow or to-day and consider this subject and report to us if we want to act upon it before the week expires. There is a great deal of business on the table. The Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. MORRILL,] has a bill that he desires very much to pass. I have heard this body called a great many times an august body, but I believe some of the Senators want to make it a September body, if they can, for this session. [Laughter.] This continual delay, postponing, adjourning over, and doing no business, is crowding us not only into the summer, but beyond it.

Mr. POMEROY. If we could have an executive session to complete some matters which the Committee on Indian Affairs have reported, and which are pending before the Senate, it would very much promote the public business and the public interest. ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the motion by substituting "Friday at twelve o'clock" for "Saturday at half past eleven o'clock."

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next at half past eleven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following joint resolutions, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 262) authorizing certain distilled spirits to be turned over to the Surgeon General for the use of the Army hospitals—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 263) to declare the meaning of the acts relating to Pacific railroads—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 13, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE P. VAN WYCK, of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPENSES OF COAST SURVEY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of expenses of the Coast Survey for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GAUGERS FOR PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1061) providing for the appropriation of four additional gaugers for the port of Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ARREST OF A REVENUE COLLECTOR.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask permission of the House to make a brief statement in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the Clerk to read a telegraphic dispatch which appears in the papers this morning, and which I have marked and now send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Arrest of a Revenue Collector.

NEW YORK, May 12.—Collector Joseph F. Bailey, of the fourth revenue district of this city, was brought before Justice Dodge, of the Jefferson Market police court, this afternoon, and held to answer to the charge of perjury, preferred by George B. Davis, a detective in the employ of the secret service of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say that I know nothing, and the Committee of Ways and Means, I believe, know nothing in regard to the merits of any complaint that may have been made against Collector Bailey. But we do know that we have nobody employed in any secret detective service whatever. We neither claim to have the authority, nor have we had the disposition to enter into any service of that kind, through the agency of Mr. Davis or anybody else. All that is known to the committee about Mr. Davis is, that in the course of our investigations he appeared before us as a witness on one occasion; and my recollection is that we did not attach any particular importance to the testimony he gave.

WHITEHALL AND PLATTSBURG RAILROAD.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a bill for which I asked unanimous consent on Monday last, in regard to the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company. I do not think it will give rise to any debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company to locate, construct, and operate its railroad across the land belonging to the United States at Plattsburg, in the State of New York, upon a line commencing in the highway leading from Plattsburg to Peru, at a point one hundred feet from the north line of the inclosure surrounding the Government building, running thence in a northeasterly direction about one thousand six hundred feet to the bank of Lake Champlain, thence northward along the banks of the said lake to the north line of the land of the United States, such line being designated on a map of survey of the same made by James P. Campbell, and now on file in the office of the Secretary of War; provided that the right of way herein granted shall be subject to such restrictions as the Secretary of War may think necessary to protect the interest of the United States; and provided farther, that no more than four rods in width of the Government land shall be occupied under the provisions of this act.

No objection was made; and the bill (H. R. No. 1062) to grant the right of way to the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company was received and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. This bill needs no explanation at all. The War Department approves of it, but has no authority to allow this road to be located across the public grounds. The bill gives the authority.

Mr. MILLER. Will this do any damage to the public property?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all; and there is a provision that it shall be subject to such restrictions as the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the interests of the United States. The following letter from the engineer department gives all the information that is necessary:

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT, June 19, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the petition, with accompanying papers, from the board of directors of the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company, asking for a grant to the company of the right to occupy and use four rods in width of the United States grounds at Plattsburg, along the line shown on plat herewith, for the purpose of building and using said road, and for no other purpose whatever.

Colonel Blunt, the senior engineer officer in that quarter, reports as follows:

OSWEGO, NEW YORK, June 6, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to report that in my opinion there exists no special objections to granting to the Plattsburg and Whitehall Railroad Company the right of way over the public land near Plattsburg, New York, under the ordinary restrictions as to removal of track when the United States, by their proper officers, shall require such removal for the public interest, and a requirement that such fences, retaining walls, bridges, &c., shall be constructed and maintained by the company as may be judged necessary by the engineer or other officer under whose supervision the matter may be placed.

The proximity of the Saranac river on the west forces the line of the road upon the public land, and the particular course indicated seems as unobjectionable as any. It will require a ten or twelve feet cutting for the greater part of the distance.

The petition of the company, with map, received with department letter of May 21, were returned by me on the 24th May.

Very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

C. E. BLUNT,

Lieutenant Colonel of Engineers,

Brevet Colonel U. S. Army.

General A. A. HUMPHREYS,

Chief Engineer, United States Army, Washington City.

The opinion of Colonel Blunt is concurred in, and it is recommended that his suggestions be adopted as to the conditions to be imposed upon the company if the privileges they ask be granted.

In this connection I respectfully submit the following remarks:

It is considered that as public land can only be acquired through the joint agency of the legislative and executive departments, so no permission for the occupation of the public lands, except for governmental uses, can be valid without the consent of the legislative department. If this view be correct, it will be necessary to inform the directors of the Whitehall and Plattsburg railroad that recourse should be had by them to Congress for the passage of a law granting the privilege they desire.

The public lands at Plattsburg have never been occupied by permanent defenses, nor is it probable that such works will ever be required there. An occasion might arise when this would be a convenient point for the accumulation of supplies and the concentration of troops, when temporary defenses might be deemed necessary.

This statement is made to account for the fact that the engineer department has not for many years, if ever, had the care of the public lands at Plattsburg. It is among those places the care of which is supposed to belong to the Quartermaster General of the Army under paragraphs one thousand and sixty-one and one thousand and ninety-five of the regulations, and it is respectfully recommended that the papers in this case be referred to his office.

A. A. HUMPHREYS.

Chief of Engineers, Major General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS CORPS OF ENGINEERS.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1868.

THOMAS LINCOLN CASEY,

Major of Engineers and Lieut. Col. U. S. Army.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTIONS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the General of the Army be severally directed to communicate to this House the reports of the several district commanders of the elections held for and against the ratification of the proposed constitutions in the States of Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Louisiana, and for the election of officers thereunder in said States, together with all the accompanying papers forwarded by them or any of them touching said election or the revised registration authorized by the reconstruction acts of Congress.

Mr. BECK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY BARRICKLOW.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1063) for the relief of Henry Barricklow; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1867.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred under the law to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there shall be printed, for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, one hundred and eighty thousand copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1867, to be distributed in equal numbers to each of the congressional districts of the United States.

PUGET SOUND, ETC., RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. PRICE called for the regular order. The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, that committee being entitled to another morning hour.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back, with amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 184) to incorporate the Puget Sound and Columbia River Railroad Company.

The bill was read.

Mr. PRICE. I am instructed by the committee to offer several amendments. The first is to add to the names of the corporators the following: R. R. Haines, F. T. McElroy, Joseph Cashman, George A. Barnes, T. J. McKinney, Frederick A. Clark, S. D. Home, Marshall F. Moore, G. A. Meigs, Arthur A. Spinney, G. V. Calhoun, Cyrus Walker, A. A. Denny, P. D. Moore, C. E. P. Wood, Philip Ritz, D. S. Baker, E. L. Fowler, Hazard Stevens, Philip Keach, P. Becher Van Trump.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I am also directed by the committee to offer the following amendment:

In the seventeenth and eighteenth lines of the first section strike out "the town of Steilacoom" and insert "some point;" so as to read, "beginning at some point on Puget sound."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I also submit on behalf of the committee the following amendment:

In the eighteenth line of the first section strike out the words "Pierce county."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I am also directed by the committee to submit the following amendment:

In the eighth line of the second section insert after the word "said" the words "right of;" so as to read, "said right of way is granted to said railroad," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I also offer on behalf of the committee the following amendment:

In the ninth line of the second section strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to read, "to the extent of one hundred feet in width," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. The committee has also directed me to submit the following amendment:

At the end of the second section strike out the following words: "And the right of way shall be exempt from taxation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I also submit, by direction of the committee, the following amendment:

In the eighth line of the third section strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" so as to read, "ten alternate sections."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment to this third section.

Mr. PRICE. I prefer that the amendments of the committee should first be acted on. Some of them may accomplish the object desired by the gentleman.

I am directed by the committee to offer a further amendment:

In the twenty-third line of the third section strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read, "thirty miles."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move, on the eighth and ninth pages, to strike out these words:

And said commissioners in their assessment of damages shall appraise such premises at what would have been the value thereof if the road had not been built.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE, I move, on page 11, to strike out these words:

But in case no claimant shall appear within six years from the time of opening said road across any land, all claims to damages against said company shall be forever barred.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move, on page 12, section eleven, line two, to strike out the word "proceedings;" and in lieu thereof to insert "receipts;" so it will read as follows:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the directors of said company shall make an annual report of their receipts and expenditures, verified by the affidavits of the president and at least three of the directors; and they shall, from time to time, fix, determine, and regulate the fares, tolls, and charges to be received and paid for transportation of persons and property on said road, or any part thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move on the fourteenth page, line ten, after the word "territory," to insert "and by mailing a copy of said notice to such stockholder;" so it will read:

Sixty days' previous notice shall be given of the payments required and of the time and place of payment, by publishing a notice in one newspaper in Washington Territory, and by mailing a copy, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move, after the word "pay," in line eleven, same page, to insert "within thirty days, after the expiration of said sixty days."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I now move, on page 15, line twelve, to strike out "assume;" and insert "issue," a mere verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move, on page 15, line nineteen, to strike out the words, "and all sales of stock bonds that may be made at less than par value shall be good and binding upon the company as if such bonds had been sold for the full value thereof."

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the previous clauses of the bill say that less than par would be valid, or is it his intention to make it invalid if sold at less than par?

Mr. PRICE. This makes the section conform to the rest of the bill if it be adopted. The object of the committee was to prevent the company putting the bonds upon the market and buying them at less than par.

Mr. PRUYN. If I understand the chairman correctly, the effect of other portions of the bill is that they may sell to other parties under par. I am not familiar with the bill.

Mr. PRICE. That is not the intention, and that would not be the effect.

Mr. PRUYN. If that is the intention, to prevent the directors purchasing at less than par, it ought to be in the nature of a prohibition, and not general.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move after the word "working," in the sixteenth section, line four, to insert "order," a verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. At the end of the bill I move to add the following:

Provided, however, That the lands hereby granted to said railroad company shall be sold on application to actual settlers in quantities not greater than one quarter section to any one person, and at a price to be fixed by the company which shall build the road not exceeding three dollars per acre; and all sales so made by said company shall be made on the following terms, to wit: One fourth of the amount thereof shall be paid in cash at the time of purchase by the actual settler, and the balance in three equal annual payments, with interest not to exceed seven per cent. per annum until paid.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask the gentleman to modify it so it will read "with the privilege to the purchaser to pay in full."

Mr. PRICE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. PRICE. I will hear it read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will allow me to offer a few amendments.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to strike out all after the word "provided" and insert the following:

That all lands which may be granted to said company to aid in the construction of said railway shall be sold by said company only to actual settlers, in quantities not greater than one quarter section to any one person, and at a price not exceeding $1 25 per acre; and the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect; and no person shall be deemed an actual settler who does not furnish evidence in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe that it is his or her intention to enter upon, improve, and reside upon the lands he or she may purchase as and for a homestead.

I hope the amendment I submit will meet the approval of the House. I trust my efforts in behalf of actual settlers have done some good. On the 20th of January I introduced a bill substantially in the words of the amendment I have now submitted. I am not aware that any such provision was made at any prior time, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] has only adopted in part, by his amendment, the principle of my bill. In any event I will not commit myself in favor of this bill until I see some greater necessity for it.

Mr. PRICE. I cannot yield to allow that amendment, for reasons which I will state in a word. The lands retained by the Government are to be sold at $2 50 per acre, and this amendment proposes to compel the company to sell their lands at $1 25. That reason is easily understood. Then there is another reason, which I presume the gentleman does not consider. Immediately along the track of the railroad the lands are much more valuable than from five, ten, or fifteen miles from it. By the terms of the bill, as amended, the company cannot ask more than three dollars per acre for any of their lands. That is the most they can get for lands lying immediately on the track, and for land lying beyond they will, of course, be obliged to take a great deal less. They can, therefore, only get fifty cents per acre more for any of their land than the Government gets for its land. Now, if you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE], of course the land grant will be worth next to nothing.

In this connection I want to say to the House that this is a grant of land for the continuation of a road for which a grant of land was made in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, running from some point on the Pacific railroad, in the Sacramento valley, to Portland, in Oregon. That road is about four hundred miles long, running parallel with the coast, and about one hundred miles from the coast. This road from Vancouver to Puget sound is about one hundred miles long. The Senate passed a bill at the same session continuing that same land grant from Vancouver, six miles from Portland, to Puget sound, making a continuous road from Puget sound to the Central Pacific railroad, where it strikes it in the Sacramento valley. That bill came to the House and was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, was by them considered, and I was directed to report it without amendment. But the committee was not called, and, of course, it did not get before the House. This bill covers the same ground precisely; and if the House has attended to the amendments made they will observe that all the amendments are restricted, and we have made the bill conform precisely in every respect, so far as the land grant is concerned, to the act in regard to the road with which it is to form a connection.

Mr. ALLISON. If I understand the provisions of the bill as reported, the even sections not granted to the company are open to homestead settlement under the preemption and homestead law.

Mr. PRICE. Of course.

Mr. ALLISON. They are open to actual settlement without the payment of any money by the settlers.

Mr. PRICE. I so understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. But a person who desires to purchase these even sections in large quantities may pay $2 50 per acre.

Mr. PRICE. That is as I understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it would be just to the actual settler to allow him to purchase the odd sections.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. There are only twenty minutes left, and I desire to yield to the gentleman from Washington Territory, [Mr. FLANDERS.] If the House sustains the previous question, gentlemen will have an opportunity to offer such amendments as they think proper.

Several members asked Mr. PRICE to yield.

Mr. PRICE. I cannot yield to a dozen gentlemen at the same time, and now I say to gentlemen, once for all, that I will yield to the gentleman from Washington Territory, [Mr. FLANDERS,] if he claims the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. All I desire is to ask the gentleman from Iowa—

Mr. PRICE. I cannot yield now. If the House will second the previous question there will be one hour for debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We can not amend the bill then.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If we do not second the previous question we can have all the time we desire for debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. When I sought an opportunity of offering an amendment to the third section of the bill I understood the gentleman from Iowa to state distinctly that an opportunity would be given.

Mr. PRICE. That is true, and I will allow the gentleman to offer his amendment now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add to the third section the following:

And said railroad shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, and said company when required shall transport on the same any property or troops of the United States free from charges.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I rise to ask information of the Chair. I desire to know whether an opportunity will be offered to propose amendments that are germane to the bill and to take the sense of the House upon them, or whether it is the prerogative of the chairman of the committee himself to determine the propriety of amendments, and whether he will consent that amendments may be acted on by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer that that is a matter for the House to determine. If the previous question is sustained no other amendments will be in order. If it is not sustained, then amendments will be in order when the pending amendments are disposed of.

Mr. PRICE. I will waive the previous question to allow the gentleman from Illinois to ask a question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. It is that this bill is not properly reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; that it properly belongs to the Committee on the Public Lands, as this is not a railroad running east and west, but running north and south.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on two grounds. In the first place, the House referred the bill to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad for examination and report, and they have reported it back; and in the second place, if the point were a good one, it is made too late.

Mr. PRICE. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] to suggest an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire, if this bill is going to pass, as I hope it will not, to have it amended in the eleventh section by inserting after the word "directors," in line four, the following: "which report shall be transmitted to Congress;" and by adding after the word "thereof," at the end of the section, the words, "subject to the control of Congress."

The section will then read:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the directors of said company shall make an annual report of their proceedings and expenditures, verified by the affidavits of the president and at least three of the directors, which report shall be transmitted to Congress; and they shall, from time to time, fix, determine, and regulate the fares, tolls, and charges to be received and paid for transportation of persons and property on said road, or any any part thereof, subject to the control of Congress.

Mr. PRICE. Individually I have no objection to those amendments, and I do not suppose the committee have any.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask to have the consideration of the House to the amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk. Probably the gentleman from Iowa will not object to them.

The first amendment proposed by Mr. VAN WYCK was to insert in section eleven, after the words "annual report of their receipts and expenditures," the following:

And the names of the stockholders, residences of the same, amount of stock held by each, and the money actually paid by each of said stockholders, the kind of said stock, the names and residences of the directors and all other officers of the company, the amount received from passengers on the road, the amount received for freight thereon, and a statement of the indebtedness of said company, setting forth the various kinds thereof.

The second amendment was to insert in section eleven, after the words "verified by the affidavits of the president and at least three of the directors," the following:

Which reports shall be presented to the Secretary of the Interior on or before the 1st day of July in each year.

Mr. PRICE. The second amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] is covered by an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very well; I will withdraw that amendment.

Mr. PRICE. As to the first amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, it is only particularizing what the section already provides for. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. PRICE. I will hear it.

Mr. BAILEY. I propose to amend section eleven by adding to it the following:

Subject to such restrictions and regulations in regard to the same as Congress may at any time prescribe.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think that is a better provision than the one that was adopted on my motion. I would ask, therefore, that it be adopted in lieu of the one I offered.

Mr. PRICE. I have no objection.

The amendment of Mr. BAILEY was then adopted in lieu of the amendment adopted on the motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire to move an amendment to section three of this bill.

Mr. PRICE. I will hear it read.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out of section three the following: And whenever prior to said time any of said sections shall have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, preempted, or otherwise disposed of, other lands shall be selected by said company in lieu thereof under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in alternate sections and designated by odd numbers, not more than ten miles beyond the limits of said alternate sections: Provided, That all mineral lands be, and the same are hereby, excluded from the operations of this act, and in lieu thereof a like quantity of unoccupied and unappropriated agricultural lands, in odd-numbered sections, nearest to the line of said road, and within thirty miles thereof, may be selected as above provided: And provided further, That the word "mineral," where it occurs in this act, shall not be held to include iron or coal.

Mr. PRICE. I cannot yield to allow that amendment to be offered, and for this reason: and I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] will understand it fully when I say to him that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad have so modified this section as to reduce the amount of the land originally proposed by one half. Now, if the amendment proposed by the gentleman shall be adopted, then every acre of land taken up by settlers between this time and the time the company makes its selection under this grant would be so much lost to the company, and the grant probably would not amount to anything. This grant conforms exactly to one made to a similar road running exactly as this does.

Mr. JULIAN. I wish to say generally in regard to this bill, that it is not only an extraordinary, but an unprecedented bill in this House. We create by it a corporation in the distant Territory of Washington, and then grant this immense amount of land to that corporation directly.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. How much?

Mr. JULIAN. It proposes to grant a belt of twenty miles wide, with the liberty to go ten miles further on each side of the road for selections, and where there are mineral lands to go fifty miles on either side of the road for the purpose of making up the deficiency in an equal amount of agricultural lands. Sir, there is no precedent for such legislation. Besides, this bill is open to this fundamental objection: that it is a grant of land to a corporation created by ourselves within the limits of the Territory of Washington. Now, this grant should be made to the Territory of Washington, in trust for such corporation as the Legislature thereof may designate. It is in opposition to the whole policy of Congress in reference to railroad grants. This bill is so lengthy, it is so important in its startling provisions, and belongs so properly to the Committee on the Public Lands, that I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] will allow it to be referred to that committee, so that we may scrutinize it, and make its provisions conform to the ordinary legislation of Congress upon this subject.

Mr. PRICE. I agree that it was on the part of this House a very great lack of foresight to send anything to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad which has any land in it.

Mr. JULIAN. This bill, at all events, properly belongs to the Committee on the Public Lands. It has nothing to do with the Pacific railroad.

Mr. PRICE. Now, I want to reply to my friend from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] in reference to two positive declarations which he has made. In reference to the precedents, if the gentleman will look at an act passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress granting lands to the Oregon and California Railroad Company he will find precisely such a provision as I have stated. Here is the document; I appeal to "the law and the testimony."

Mr. JULIAN. Read it.

Mr. PRICE. I have not time in four minutes to read four pages of this book.

Mr. JULIAN. It is a very different provision.

Mr. PRICE. Then, again, in the act granting lands to the Atlantic and Pacific railroad the corporators are named, there being about one hundred of them. Here are two precedents established in reference to this matter. Yet my friend from Indiana says that this bill is without a precedent, unparalleled in the history of the legislation of this country. I offer the record against his declaration. The House can accept whichever they please.

Mr. JULIAN. In the case of the Pacific railroad the grant could not be made to the States, because that road was to pass through different States and through territory not organized.

Mr. PRICE. I am not speaking of the Pacific railroad; I am speaking of the Atlantic and California railroad, commencing at Springfield, Missouri, and running by way of Albuquerque to the Pacific ocean. There the corporators are named individually, there being something like one hundred. In the act incorporating the Oregon and Pacific railroad, running from Portland, in Oregon, to the Central Pacific railroad, precisely such a grant as this is made. This bill is for a continuation of that road, as gentlemen will see when they examine the matter.

Mr. JULIAN. The roads to which those grants were made passed through different States. In the present case the road is wholly in the Territory of Washington, and there is therefore no necessity for granting the land to a corporation. It would be, as I have said, an exception to our policy in making these grants.

Mr. PRICE. And we have covered that exception by a provision not embraced in any railroad grant made by the Thirty-Eighth, the Thirty-Ninth, or the Fortieth Congress. This bill is better guarded than any land grant ever passed by the Congress of the United States. We have guarded it for the purpose of protecting the public against a monopoly of this kind. Learning as we go on, we propose to make each bill a little better than its predecessors, so that eventually we may arrive at something like perfection in this branch of business.

Now, sir, I notice that my time is about to expire. I do not know what may be the disposition of the House in regard to this matter. I should be glad if my friend from Washington Territory [Mr. FLANDERS] should be allowed an opportunity to submit some remarks upon this subject, I believe, however, I must demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, if I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and the morning hour expires, what will be the condition of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will go over till to-morrow.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to conform to the wishes of the House. I will call the previous question, and the House can sustain it, if it wishes to close up this matter in an hour. If it does not, it will vote down the previous question.

On seconding the call for the previous question there were—ayes 34, noes 66.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the bill and pending amendments be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. FLANDERS. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] will not prevail.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr.

FLANDERS] will be permitted to make a brief statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANDERS. I have prepared some remarks on this subject which I would like to submit. I think if the merits of this bill were fairly presented to the House; if gentlemen here understood the importance of this land-grant railroad to Washington Territory as you, Mr. Speaker, understand it, and as some other gentlemen on this floor who have traveled over that part of the country understand it, I do not believe they would refuse to give us this land-grant to enable us to build this line of railroad.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must suspend, as the Chair thinks the time allowed him for explanation has expired.

Mr. FLANDERS. I only wish to say the whole length of the road does not exceed one hundred miles; and it passes through lands which have not yet been surveyed and which are unoccupied, where we now have no road. I hope the motion to refer to the Committee on the Public Lands will not be agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Washington Territory will be permitted to print his remarks.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Washington Territory.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. Speaker, I propose very briefly to state some of the reasons why Congress should pass this bill and extend the aid asked for, by giving to this company a grant of land to enable them to build a railroad from Puget sound to the Columbia river. The distance from Steilacoom, on Puget sound, (the probable starting point,) to Vancouver, on the Columbia river, is about one hundred miles. The proposed route of this railroad is for the most of that distance over a comparatively level country, running through the Cowlitz valley, crossing the Chehalis river and valley, also the Nesqualla valley, passing a large portion of the distance not only over unoccupied but unsurveyed lands—and as beautiful and fertile as any on this continent, but now unoccupied, uncultivated, and almost unknown, but which will in a few years, if this and other lines of communication are open, support as dense a population as is found in any of the older States. The importance of a road across this isthmus, which separates the largest river that empties in the Pacific ocean from the most beautiful inland sea on the globe, cannot be overestimated, connecting, as it will, the Columbia river, which drains that vast region of country which lies between the Rocky mountains on the east, the Cascade mountains on the west, extending almost to the Arctic Circle on the north, and into which flow the waters of western Utah and northern Nevada on the south, and which then breaks through the Cascade range of mountains, and receives on its way to the ocean the waters of Willamette, then flows on through an almost still unbroken forest for one hundred and thirty miles, and pours its immense volume into the Pacific. This is the river which this bill proposes to connect by railroad with the waters of Puget sound.

It is doubtless known to every member of this House that Washington Territory, which contains about seventy thousand square miles, is divided by the Cascade mountains into two nearly equal parts, what may properly be called eastern and western Washington.

It may not, however, be known that we have no road connecting those distant portions of our Territory. Neither have we any road from the Columbia river to the sound, with the exception of a military road which was built by the Government about fifteen or sixteen years ago from the Cowlitz river, at a point six miles above its junction with the Columbia, to Olympia, about ninety miles. This road, bad at all times, is nearly impassable for four months in the year. Not only is our Territory nearly equally divided, but the population of the eastern and western portions is about equal.

The present means of communication between those two portions of the Territory, and the only route by which the people of those counties east of the mountains can reach Olympia, the capital, is to go down the Columbia river to the Cowlitz, thence overland by the road which was just spoken of. Over this road during the past winter it has been found impossible to carry the mails for weeks together. And to show the delay to which the mails are liable on this route I will state that my letters from Olympia and other points on Puget sound, which should reach me in from twenty-two to twenty-four days, have been since last November from forty-two to sixty-four days on the way.

It will therefore be seen that the people of the eastern portion of the Territory are practically cut off from attending the sittings of the Legislature or of the supreme court. Give us this road, and by it and the Columbia river the eastern and western portions of the Territory are brought, by steamboat and railroad, into easy and speedy communication with each other. The building of this road is important, as it will open and make available much of the best land of the Territory. As I said before, it runs through the Cowlitz valley, which does not contain less than five hundred thousand acres of good land, now almost wholly unoccupied. It crosses the Chehalis river and valley, a valley equally as large as the Cowlitz, and which, perhaps, contains more good land. The Chehalis river, which runs through this valley and empties into the Pacific ocean at Gray's harbor, is navigable for small steamers for a distance of about ninety miles from its mouth, and to a point near where this railroad would cross that stream. All the land along this river and in this valley would be taken up and improved as soon as this road is built. This road also crosses the Nesqualla valley, but little less in extent than either of the others, and which is equally as fertile.

Not only will it open up these three large valleys which I have named and cause the land in them to be immediately taken up and improved, but it will open almost innumerable smaller valleys along its entire length and on either side, lands which are now unoccupied and valueless to the Government and to the people, and which will remain so until this or some similar road is built. Let me state some further reasons why this road should be built. There was shipped during the last year from Walla Walla valley to San Francisco and New York not less than two thousand tons of flour. And that while the mill-owners on Puget sound were actually buying their flour in San Francisco, flour which was made in Washington Territory and shipped from there to the sound, so that it was found cheaper to transport this flour from Portland to San Francisco and from San Francisco back to Puget sound, a distance of not less than fourteen hundred miles, and to pay two commissions and the cost of reshipment, than to transport it less than one hundred miles over any road we now have.

It must be remembered that the great interests of Puget sound is the lumber business, and that the flour and grain thus shipped were to supply those engaged in the manufacture of lumber.

I wish to state in this connection that there was shipped during the last year from Puget sound more than two hundred million feet of manufactured lumber and spars, and not less than twenty thousand tons of coal. From Puget sound we are in part or wholly supplying not only the Pacific coast with lumber, south from San Francisco to Valparaiso, but large quantities are shipped to Australia, the Sandwich islands, and all the islands of the Pacific. Also large quantities of manufactured lumber and spars are shipped every year to China. And the dockyards of Europe are supplied with spars from our forests. This trade, now in its infancy, will in a few years become of national importance. We possess here and in our recent purchase of Alaska the last great forests of the world, and, if the supply is unlimited no limits can be placed upon the future demand. The importance and extent of this immense inland sea, the number and beauty of its numerous harbors, the value of the magnificent forests by which it is surrounded, and its inexhaustible coal beds along its shores, are but little understood or appreciated by those who have not seen and examined for themselves; possessing, as it does, more than seventeen hundred miles of inland shore lines, having in every channel, bay, or harbor sufficient depth of water for the largest ship that floats in any navy in the world, channels unobstructed by rocks or sand bars, with an entrance so broad and safe that no pilots have been or ever will be needed.

Let me say a word in regard to a very important branch of business now in its infancy, but which at no distant day is destined to become of the first importance to our whole country. I speak of ship building. The board of underwriters of San Francisco have been engaged during the past year, through their president, Mr. Hopkins, in collecting all the information possible in regard to the cost of building ships in New York, Massachusetts, and Maine, and they have satisfied themselves that ships can be built for less money on Puget sound than they can in any of the places named, notwithstanding the higher cost on the Pacific coast of labor and some of the material used, such as iron, copper, and cordage, yet the facilities for getting good lumber and spars are so much greater on Puget sound than on any part of the Atlantic coast that it more than makes up for the difference in the price of labor and the material named. Already many vessels have been built there, and among them some large ships, so that this business can no longer be said to be an experiment.

I will give, in this connection, a list of sixteen vessels built on the Pacific coast north of San Francisco, their cost in gold, with their tonnage and cost per ton, which I obtain from a report recently made to the board of marine underwriters of San Francisco by C. T. Hopkins, esq., president of the California Insurance Company, and secretary of the board of marine underwriters and Chamber of Commerce:

This report states:

"It is evident from an inspection of this table that small vessels have been and are being built on our coast good enough to rate as well as the average of similar eastern-built vessels, and furthermore, they can be constructed here at a cost in gold no greater than the present gold cost in New York. This may seem to be a startling statement, but it will be seen from the letter of Henry Steers that the present cost of building vessels of one hundred tons in New York is $115 currency, or $82 80 gold; of vessels of two hundred tons, $112 currency, $80 64 gold. Now, four vessels, Occident, Argo, Melancthon, and Blanco, cost respectively only $77, $70, $84, and $75 in gold per ton."

In regard to our ship timbers this same report says:

"RED AND YELLOW FIR.—These trees, which constitute about one half of the dense growth of timber of Oregon and Washington Territory, have become celebrated throughout the world for their magnificent proportions and the serviceable quality of spars and lumber supplied from them. They frequently furnish sticks one hundred and fifty feet long, eighteen by eighteen and even a twenty-four by twenty-four inches square, without a particle of sap, without a rent or check, perfectly sound and straight. Planks from this timber sixty and ninety feet long are readily obtained." * * * "As to the strength of these timbers, many mechanics think it fully equal to that of eastern white oak."

This timber can be furnished at our mills on Puget sound in exhaustless quantities at ten to twelve dollars per thousand feet. We also have many other valuable timbers for ship building, such as tide-land spruce, yellow cedar, white cedar, and laurel. The western section of Washington Territory, between the ocean and the Cascade mountains, is about three hundred and fifty miles in length from north to south, with an average width of about one hundred miles from east to west, and contains more than eleven million acres, being as large as the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and there is nothing that would do so much for settlement of those vast tracts of land as the building of this road. It would not only assist in developing the agricultural resources of our Territory, but it would stimulate our commercial and manufacturing interests, and assist to bring into use the magnificent water-power of our Territory, equal in extent to all the water-power of New England.

The building of this railroad is also very important in a military point of view. It will at once be seen how valuable as a means of communication this line would become in case of a war with any maritime Power, especially in a war with England. Such a war I trust may never come, but our Government should wisely provide in time of peace for all such exigencies which cannot be foreseen, but which may at any time be precipitated upon us.

It is also one link in that line of railroads which is to connect the great lakes with the waters of the Pacific at Puget sound. In this respect its importance should not be overlooked, and cannot be overestimated. As has already been seen it connects with the Columbia, whose navigable waters reach far into the interior of the continent, therefore assisting in the construction of that next great national work, the building of the Northern Pacific railroad, connecting with that road as well as with the Union Pacific—those two great iron arteries which are destined to carry the travel and the commerce of the two hemispheres across our continent. According to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1867, Congress by different enactments have granted land in aid of railroad enterprises in different States, as follows:

Illinois.....	2,595,053
Mississippi.....	2,062,240
Alabama.....	3,729,130
Florida.....	2,360,114
Louisiana.....	1,578,720
Arkansas.....	4,804,271
Missouri.....	3,745,160
Iowa.....	6,751,207
Michigan.....	5,327,930
Wisconsin.....	5,378,360
Minnesota.....	7,783,403
Kansas.....	7,753,000
California.....	3,720,000

Pacific railroads "estimated"..... 57,588,578
Wagon-Roads..... 124,000,000

Wisconsin.....	250,000
Michigan.....	1,718,613
Oregon.....	1,256,800

Total number of acres..... 184,813,991

Of these one hundred and eighty-four million eight hundred and thirteen thousand nine hundred and ninety-one acres of land granted to aid in building different lines of railroad but twenty-one million five hundred and sixty-one thousand six hundred and fifty-four acres have been certified under these grants. All the balance is to be certified to after the conditions upon which the grants are made to the different companies are complied with. The regret is not that the Government has parted with this magnificent domain to encourage those different railroad enterprises, but that it had not been done twenty years sooner.

We have to-day in the United States not less than thirty-seven thousand miles of railroads in complete running order, the cost of which is estimated at $1,855,000,000. In addition to this, there are, by estimates, seventeen thousand six hundred and eighty-five miles of railroad in process of construction. Had all these grants of land been made twenty years ago, and were these seventeen thousand miles of projected railroads now in process of construction an accomplished fact, will any gentleman assert here or elsewhere that our Government or our country would have been the poorer for having given these lands to aid in building these railways? I think not; for every acre of land given for this purpose the Government receives its full equivalent by the enhanced value of the land which is retained, and every acre of land brought under cultivation, and which, from improvements put upon it, is increased in value from one dollar and a quarter an acre to two, five, or ten dollars an acre, is so much added to the permanent wealth of the nation.

Take as an example the county of Walla Walla, in my own Territory; twelve years ago there was not a dozen settlers in that county. The white population is now between five and six thousand. Walla Walla county will pay to our Government this fiscal year of 1868 not less than $50,000 internal revenue tax alone. Had these projected lines of railroad been completed ten years ago my Territory, instead of a white population of less than forty thousand, as it now has, would have had four hundred thousand; and where we now contribute but one dollar toward the expense of our Government we should contribute ten. And what is true of Washington Territory is equally true of all the other Territories; it is especially true of Idaho and Montana. Had these projected railroads been built ten years ago the standing army that it is now necessary to keep on the "Plains," at an annual cost of, perhaps, $20,000,000, to hold in check a few roving bands of Indians, who traverse the "Plains" from New Mexico to British Columbia, would no longer be needed. For before the advancing tide of civilization the Indian and the buffalo will disappear together. By the building of these railroads the expense of the Government is greatly lessened, while its resources are greatly increased.

If there is anything that will give new life and vigor to our commercial and manufacturing towns and cities, if there is anything that will lessen the present burden of taxation, that will assist us in the payment of our enormous national debt, it is the completion of our present projected lines of railroads, and by extending them in every direction. To accomplish this it is only necessary that Congress should pursue the same liberal policy which it inaugurated a few years since, and which has already accomplished so much. Less than thirty years ago almost all our vast empire west of the Mississippi, and much of that on this side, was as wild and as unknown as the country between the Pacific ocean and the Cascade mountains and north of the Columbia river now is. Our Government has generously and wisely extended its protection and its aid to the pioneer and settlers, and those vast prairies, so recently but unknown solitudes, are now the home of millions of free and happy people. And let me say just here that the men who ask this charter and this grant of land will, if they obtain it, build this road. Every one of these gentlemen named in this bill as corporators live in Washington Territory, men who have made that their home, and who are now actively engaged in all the enterprises carried on there. So far there has never been an acre of land granted by the Government to the people of Washington Territory in building any road of any description. We ask this aid not of money or of bonds, but of land, fully believing and expecting that it will be given us.

And let me remind the gentlemen on this floor that the people who ask this still regard themselves as your constituents. They have left their old homes in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and all the other States, and have made their new homes in what was until recently the most northern and western portion of this Union. But they have not forgotten their old friends or their old homes; they appeal to you to aid them in this enterprise; to extend to them the same assistance that you have heretofore given to other States and Territories; and they do not believe that Congress will refuse or withhold its aid in building this railroad when its importance to our Territory is appreciated or understood.

Washington Territory has asked but little and has received but little from the General Government; heretofore our claims for assistance have been almost entirely overlooked or disregarded. The oldest Territory, or the oldest but one, in the United States, we feel that we have not received that consideration from the General Government to which we are justly entitled. Of this, however, we do not complain. We understand and appreciate the sacrifices that our Government has had to make during the last seven years for its very existence. And we do not now forget the enormous debt that still hangs over us, or the heavy taxation to which the people of this country are now subjected. Therefore the people of my Territory only ask that Congress will extend such aid to us as will enable us to develop the resources of our Territory, that we may fairly start in that career of prosperity which lies before us. No State or Territory in this Union has a brighter future than has Washington Territory. It possesses within itself more of the elements of future wealth and greatness than any State or Territory in the Union. Its mild and healthy climate, its productive and fertile soil, its magnificent forests, its immense beds of coal, its known mineral wealth, its numerous bays and harbors, with the Columbia river running through the Territory from north to south, and then along its southern boundary for four hundred miles, which is navigable with its branches for a thousand miles; with three hundred miles fronting on the Pacific ocean, and two good harbors, Shoal Water bay and Gray's harbor, between the mouth of Columbia river and the Straits of Fuca; all this points with unerring certainty to its future wealth and greatness. With the completion of the Northern Pacific railroad our Territory becomes a central point on the map of the world, and on the shores of Puget sound will rise a city which will not only contend with San Francisco for the control of the commerce of the Pacific, but which is destined to become one of the great commercial centers of the world, halfway from Western Europe to Eastern Asia. Nearer than San Francisco to New York by five hundred miles, and nearer by seven hundred miles to Yokohama and Hong-Kong than is San Francisco, what shall prevent its growth?

If the progress of our Territory heretofore has been slow, it is only for the lack of what this bill under consideration is intended to supply, at least in part, by furnishing one line of communication from the Columbia river to Puget sound.

Mr. JULIAN. Do I understand that this matter has been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. JULIAN. I have no hostility at all to this general proposition if it be put in a less objectionable form. Let it go to the Committee on the Public Lands and be examined by the proper committee. I now insist on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 43.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The bill and amendments were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendments were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOYAL CREEKS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, asking for an appropriation of $6,800 for the expense in taking a census of loyal Creeks, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. CHURCHILL.

ADMISSION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order was House bill No. 1058, to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I offer an amendment to the constitution of the State of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. There is a substitute pending submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. My amendment is to the constitution of Georgia. I move to insert the following:

And be it further enacted, That the provisions of section seventeen, article five, of the constitution of Georgia shall not apply to a debt due to any person who, during the whole time of the rebellion, was loyal to the United States and opposed to secession.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is this Congress going to set itself up to amend these State constitutions?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine and not the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I propose that amendment for this reason: The constitution of Georgia nullifies all debts due before a certain period, as well those due to loyal men as to rebels. My amendment is that it shall nullify only those due to rebels and not those due to loyal men.

Mr. ROBINSON. How is the gentleman going to pick out the loyal and the disloyal debtors?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I am not going to do it. Anybody who claims to be loyal will, I presume, pick himself out.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I merely interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the purpose of inquiring whether this proposed amendment is his individual amendment or whether it comes from the Committee on Reconstruction?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is an individual amendment. I discovered this morning that the provision in regard to debts applied to loyal men as well as to rebels. That, of course, I thought wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question or a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot be taken off the floor except by a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to make a motion which will take him from the floor.

The SPEAKER. No motion can take him from the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the House do not now consider this subject, for the reason that there are a thousand things exactly like what the gentleman indicates, which I have found in these constitutions, which we ought to have time to read over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point. The motion is not made at the right time. This bill has been considered by the House already. It was reported day before yesterday, postponed, and made the special order for to-day after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of. The question should have been raised when the bill was introduced.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it would be well to let this go over.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] allow me to say that I think the constitution of South Carolina and of the other States included in this bill have similar defects, which it would be well to have amended?

Mr. PRUYN. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair to rule that the House has no right to legislate or attempt to legislate so as to interfere with the provisions of the constitution of any State in the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. He declines to rule as the gentleman from New York desires, because if that were his prerogative he might be called to rule thus on bills which many members regard as unconstitutional, and which even the President vetoes as not being constitutional. The Speaker has no right in any legislative body to rule whether a proposition is constitutional or not, only whether it is parliamentary. Its constitutionality affects its merits, and such questions are to be decided by the House, and not by the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask him where he gets authority, either in the Constitution or elsewhere, to amend the constitution of a State?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I find it in the Constitution, which says that Congress may admit new States. I hold that under that provision Congress may admit them in just such a shape as it pleases. That power being fully granted, we have a right to exercise it. I do not find any difficulty about it.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like the gentleman to go on and give us his argument on that point, because there are some of us who do find great difficulty.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Anybody who needs argument on that point I cannot enlighten. [Laughter.] I now will proceed to say—

Mr. BOYER. Will my colleague allow me to ask a question?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BOYER. I see one paragraph of the section referred to applies to the taxation of debts, judgments, and causes of actions. I desire to know of my colleague whether he intends his amendment shall prevent the taxation of debts, judgments, and causes of action due to loyal men?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I expect them to modify the constitution according to the provisions of this act. Now, sir, we have introduced this bill. I stated when it was postponed that it was for the purpose of allowing full discussion. For my part I do not wish to discuss it. I intend to reserve to myself only the closing hour, and only a small part of that, probably. I intend to give to others—the rest of the time, merely remarking that I intend before we adjourn to-day to call the previous question, so that we may take the vote to-morrow morning, allowing, however, just as late discussion to-day as gentlemen may think proper.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. It is not intended to take a vote till to-morrow. I hope, therefore, the gentleman will not call the previous question to-morrow until he sees the returns of the district commanders relative to these elections which the House has directed to be printed, sent by the Secretary of War. They will be in this evening or to-morrow morning. Perhaps there may be something there that the House will like to see.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It will depend altogether upon the condition of things just before we adjourn. I think I can accommodate the gentleman by holding the floor and calling the previous question to-morrow morning if he desires longer time. And now if any gentleman wishes to occupy the floor I will yield to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman suggests that this afternoon be devoted to debate on the bill, as the Chair understands, by gentlemen representing the minority, the gentleman himself to be entitled to the floor at the close of the session, so that he can move the previous question to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Or to-night.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman proposes to close the debate this afternoon.

Mr. BROOKS. This is not done by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman only asks to be entitled to the floor at the close of the session to-day, and, under the usage of the House, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will only say now that I do not desire to debate this bill, and if any gentleman of the minority desires it I will yield to him.

Mr. BECK obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment to offer an amendment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS. At the proper time I shall move to add to the substitute the following section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That on and after the passage of this act all citizens of the United States in the States hereinbefore named shall be admitted to equal rights of suffrage.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to be able to make a speech upon the merits of these constitutions; but as a member of the minority of the Committee on Reconstruction I propose, at the request of the senior member of it, [Mr. Brooks,] to state the objections which we have to them. There are five of them in all. By the provisions of this bill all have to be considered together, and they are so varied in their provisions that it is almost impossible to consider them properly in one bill or in a single argument. By the provisions of the constitution of Louisiana, for example, very many men have been excluded from the right of suffrage by the constitution framed by the convention who, by the reconstruction acts of Congress, are authorized to register and vote, and at the election held in the State of Louisiana on the ratification of the constitution all those men were excluded from the right of suffrage under the constitution framed by the convention in spite of the provisions of the reconstruction laws. In North Carolina and Georgia, on the other hand, by the action of the conventions of those States the right of suffrage is extended beyond what is permitted under the reconstruction acts; and yet, although the conventions of those States gave them permission to vote for officers under the constitution, they were not allowed to do so. So that every one of the officers elected from those States were elected because thousands of men were excluded from voting who under the constitutions framed by the conventions of those States were legal voters. Hence the difficulty of considering them altogether; but I will endeavor to do so as rapidly as I can.

I understand, of course, sir, from what occurred in regard to the Arkansas constitution the other day, that it is useless for me to attempt to stay the action of the House on this bill by any objections I may make. I thought it was demonstrated to this House in regard to Arkansas that its constitution had been rejected by the people of that State beyond all peradventure, and that even the partial investigation which had been made, and the papers which were in the possession of the House, showed the frauds so conclusively that no man on the other side could doubt for a moment that the majority of the people of that State had, in fact, voted against the ratification of the constitution; yet the bill was passed in hot haste, and I presume this omnibus bill will be passed in like manner from political necessity or some other cause.

There is another difficulty at this time about this matter. No gentleman upon either side of the House fully understands the merits of the bill. On yesterday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] had a resolution passed calling upon the General of the Army for the returns of the elections in these States. The General of the Army makes a return to-day in some ten or twelve lines, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1868.

Sir: In compliance with resolution of the House of Representatives of May 11, 1868, I have the honor to submit the following statement of the number of votes cast for and against the constitutions of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Alabama, as reported by the several district commanders:

North Carolina.
Votes for constitution.....	92,590
Votes against constitution.....	71,820
South Carolina.
Votes for constitution.....	70,758
Votes against constitution.....	27,238
Georgia.
Votes for constitution.....	89,007
Votes against constitution.....	71,309
Louisiana.
Votes for constitution.....	66,152
Votes against constitution.....	48,739
Alabama.
Votes for constitution.....	69,807
Votes against constitution.....	1,005

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT, General.
Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

There are no reports from the district commanders or the commissioners who conducted the election sent to us by the General. Nothing to show whether the registration was altered—they had power to extend or curtail it under the reconstruction laws—and nothing to show how the elections were conducted, whether fairly or fraudulently.

Seeing that this report did not contain the information needed, this morning, by the unanimous consent of the House, I offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling upon the Secretary of War and the General of the Army to furnish to this House the reports of the district commanders in these States, and all the accompanying papers relative to the elections and registration, and the changes made therein. When these papers are received the House will better understand what has been done in each of these States. I hope they will be here to-morrow; and it was for that reason that I requested the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to call the previous question until to-morrow morning, so that members of the House may be able to see and examine those reports and act intelligently upon them; because I assume that it is the interest of all of us to know exactly the facts upon which we are basing our action. Those facts are not before the House, which, had they been, it would have devolved upon me, as a member of the minority of the committee, to have presented to the House. Not being here, and being unable now to obtain them, I cannot present them to the House as I ought and am, perhaps, expected to do.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in the motion he made a few moments ago, to amend the constitution of the State of Georgia, has boldly avowed the true position of the majority in regard to the constitutions of the southern States. I say in all candor that his proposition to amend the constitution of the State of Georgia, because it does not suit this House, is presenting the issue fairly and clearly. This House made that constitution; it ordered how it should be made, selected or rather appointed the men to frame it; and all the others excluded from or admitted to the polls whom they pleased, and under the pretense of an election not only told the people of these States what their constitutions should be and remain, but that none but adherents of the dominant party should have any part or lot in the administration of the governments under them, no matter how odious they might be to the people there.

These constitutions do not represent the action of the people of any of those States, but they represent, in fact, the will and the orders of Congress. This House has just as much power—I do not say right, but power—to alter, amend, and make those State constitutions what they please, to say what they shall and what they shall not contain, who are elected and who are not elected, who shall and who shall not be admitted to seats on this floor and on the floor of the Senate, and who shall and who shall not occupy the State offices, as they have to do what they have done, and it would be more manly to avow it boldly at once.

The papers now presented here as State constitutions are in fact but the action of Congress, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] or any other amendment, is just as legitimate, valid, and binding on the people of the South as the papers now presented are, and it would be no more the action of this House if adopted than are these papers now before us as constitutions of these southern States are. By the adoption of such amendments now, the people of the country would understand clearly what is the undoubted fact, that Congress has framed constitutions and appointed officers to govern these States, and men to represent them here without their consent and against their will. The sooner they understand and appreciate these facts the better, as the remedy will be the sooner applied.

It will be observed that this bill sets forth in its preamble that the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama have framed and adopted these constitutions by "large majorities of the votes cast at the elections held for the ratification or rejection of the same." Now, so far as Alabama is concerned—and I will speak of that first—all the facts are known to this House. We all know that the constitution of Alabama was defeated, and defeated in the mode permitted by the laws passed by this Congress, and this House has so decided; yet we are called upon to impose that constitution upon the people of Alabama, a constitution which they themselves have rejected, which we have said they have rejected. The people of Alabama having discarded that constitution, it is now brought forward in an omnibus bill, along with constitutions of other States, and we are asked to declare that they have adopted that constitution. But for my brief experience here, I would say that such a proposition was too monstrous to be entertained for a moment.

And what is the object of this? Simply to put certain persons in power over the people of Alabama upon the floor of this House and upon the floor of the Senate, who will sustain the policy and execute the will of the majority here; to put over that State a Governor and other officers, and to place it under the control of a Legislature composed of men whom we know, as we have admitted by our votes, have been rejected by the people under the very provisions of laws which we laid down for them to vote under.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to inquire of the gentleman, in order that it may be well understood by the House, whether he does not know that the amendment presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] to restrict the operation of the constitution of Georgia touching debts, has not received the approval of any member of the Committee on Reconstruction?

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asserted that fact himself; he stated that it was his individual proposition. But I say this: that if it does not meet the approval of this House it will be the first time that any proposition has been seriously presented and maintained and pressed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania that the members of his party have not come up to its support, whether they liked it at first or not. And I fear that the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] himself, before we get through, notwithstanding his present objection, will yet have to yield to the dictates of his great leader.

Mr. BINGHAM. I must correct the gentleman. The statement he now makes is certainly contradicted by the record in innumerable cases. The gentleman ought not to make such statements here, for they do injustice.

Mr. BECK. I merely assert on the floor of this House and before the country that the positions taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] are followed by his party in almost every instance, whether at first they liked them or not. That gentleman was the first on the floor of this House to claim that these States were outlying territories, conquered provinces, and subject to the dictation of this Congress; that we here were their masters and had a right to dictate terms to them. At first the majority of the party opposed the gentleman; but now they have marched up to him, and I presume they are now ready to impose constitutions upon the people of these States, when it is admitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself in his speech when the Alabama bill was up before, and by the action of this House in adopting the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] that the constitution sought to be imposed on Alabama had not been adopted by the people of that State.

I hope the distinguished gentleman from Ohio will now take ground more conservative. He has good reason for doing so; for on the floor of the House his colleague [Mr. VAN TRUMP] on Monday last presented—perhaps the gentleman has not seen it—a joint resolution of the Legislature of Ohio protesting against the reconstruction acts of Congress and against the passage of certain bills now pending therein, and instructing their Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for the repeal of the former and against the passage of the latter; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed. I hope that these conservative resolutions, which I have been unable to get, (for they are still in the hands of the printer,) may induce gentlemen to obey the mandate of the great State of Ohio, which he has the honor in part to represent.

But I was remarking that the State of Alabama has rejected this constitution now sought to be imposed on her, and has said that she did not want the services of the men sought to be placed over her. General Meade, in his report, which is before this House, which was brought in on the very day on which we took the vote upon the first Alabama bill, but brought in after the vote had been cast, says:

The constitution failing of ratification, the measures to be adopted become questions of importance. I have deemed it my duty to turn over to the president of the convention the returns of the election for members of Congress, State and county officers, but I have not authorized the issue of certificates of election till the questions connected with the constitution are definitely settled.

I have received and transmit herewith a letter (marked XI) from several prominent members of the Republican organization in Alabama urging a recommendation on my part of the immediate admission of the State by Congress, and maintaining that the recent election, when properly explained, will show a majority of the registered voters as being in favor of this measure.

I regret extremely that it is not in my power to coincide with these gentlemen, and cannot concur with them in their views. Acknowledging the importance of the State being at the earliest moment restored to her proper relations in the Union, I cannot but look on the result of the recent election as an expression of opinion that the registered voters do not desire to be restored under the constitution submitted to them, and in view of the recent act of Congress giving ratification to a majority of the votes cast, I would prefer seeing the convention reassembled for a revision of the constitution, and the revised constitution submitted to the people under the new law. In support of this recommendation I would refer to the letter of Governor Patton, (marked VII.) and the letters of J. T. Cantwell, one of the registrars, (marked XII.) of Dr. Moore, (marked XIII.) and of H. Reed, candidate for Governor in Alabama, (marked XIV.)

I am of the opinion that a revised constitution, more liberal in its terms and confined to the requirements of the reconstruction laws, would in Alabama, as I have reason to expect it will in Georgia and Florida, meet with the approval of the majority of the registered voters; and I beg leave to call your attention to the difficulty of carrying on a government in a State where so small a proportion of those qualified to take part in the government are in favor of the organic law, and to insure a larger proportion of what must be the governing class a more acceptable constitution should be presented to them for adoption.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. G. MEADE, Major General.

General U. S. GRANT, Commanding United States Army, Washington, D. C.

And on the floor of this House, when we were discussing the bill for the admission of Alabama, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] at the close of the debate, rose and said:

"After a full examination of the final returns from Alabama, which we had not got when this bill was drawn, I am satisfied, for one, that to force a vote on this bill and admit the State against our own law, where there is a majority of twenty odd thousand against the constitution, would not be doing such justice in legislation as will be expected by the people. With that view of the case, I shall vote for the motion to recommit, and on that motion I demand the previous question."

And when the bill came up for action the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] was adopted. By it the people of Alabama were put under a provisional government, and the constitution was ordered to be resubmitted to the votes of the people, thereby admitting that it had been rejected. Yet this bill now before us assumes that the people want that constitution; that they have already adopted it. We are now to impose upon the people that constitution which we have admitted they have rejected. And the only fact that we have before us, in addition to those before us when we acted on this subject a few weeks ago, is the report of General Grant, which has been laid on our tables this morning, showing a thousand less votes in favor of the constitution than there appeared to be the other day, when we decided that the constitution had been rejected. It was then said that seventy thousand eight hundred votes had been cast in favor of the constitution; and it now appears by the report of General Grant that there were sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and seven votes in favor of it.

That is the position in which Alabama stands. She is certainly under a government severe enough to satisfy the malice of her bitterest enemies. Only the other day seven highly respectable young men, for a mere assault and battery on a fellow by the name of Hill, were sent to the Dry Tortugas, four of them for two years and three for one year. The offense with which they were charged was a simple assault upon a man who, as the public journals assert, was known and proven to be a thief, who had not only been stealing himself, but inciting negroes to steal. He was not seriously injured. The offense was a mere assault and battery such as occurs upon the streets of your cities almost every day. Yet these men in Alabama for such an offense are sent to the Dry Tortugas, where they are under no law except the will of their keepers, where they are treated cruelly or humanely just as the commanders there see fit, compelled to labor with shaved heads and balls and chains on their legs under the heat of a tropical sun, and all this by the order of a military tribunal, in time of profound peace, without the intervention of a jury or any of the forms of law known to the Constitution.

It is no doubt part of the programme that the people of that State shall be treated in such manner as to make them do something which will give an excuse to crush them down still more, and to put them more thoroughly under the iron heel of military despotism. But they have thus far peaceably submitted to it all. They are enduring all the oppressions heaped upon them, and they are looking for relief to the free white men of the northern and western States, when the great appeal shall be made to them this fall, and when the members of this House will be called upon to give an account of their stewardship. They are looking to the sovereign people for relief, and they will get it.

So much for Alabama. I do not believe there is a man in this House who can now conscientiously vote for that provision of the bill. Let me look hurriedly at the provisions respecting the other States. There is one general fact which illustrates the character of the whole. The men who composed the conventions in those States were men who had no substantial interest in the community, mere adventurers and negroes, a majority of whom could neither read nor write. They knew no more about the fundamental laws they were called upon to frame than so many horses or mules; a few managers and political tricksters, who monopolized the lucrative offices, controlled the whole. The fact appears in all the publications of the day, and is true beyond all peradventure, that hundreds and thousands of negroes who came to the polls to vote for the constitutions and the officers under them came from the plantations with halters in their hands, that they might lead home the mules they expected to receive; for forty acres of land and a mule were promised to every ignorant negro who would vote for the constitutions. They knew no more what they were doing than the mules they expected to lead home from the ballot-box. The men who made these constitutions had no interest in the welfare of those States, and they have in most instances imposed upon the people such regulations and such restrictions on their rights and liberties as no member of this House would submit to, or would allow to be imposed upon the humblest of his own constituents.

Take the case of South Carolina, for example, and I can only state a few prominent points. Of the men composing that constitutional convention seventy were negroes and about fifty white men. Of the men composing the present Legislature of that State seventy-one are colored and fifty-four white. One item of taxation alone in that State—the taxation for the support of free schools—amounts to $1,000,000. It is provided that the white race shall never have any public school exclusively for themselves; that the white and the black children, male and female, shall be playmates and schoolmates together; that if the white citizens do not send their boys and their girls to the schools attended by the negroes they shall suffer such penalties as a negro Legislature may see fit to impose. Who are the men thus imposing these conditions upon the people of that State? As I have already said, they have no interest in the affairs of the State, no interest in its property, no interest in its taxation, and compose no part of its intelligence, wealth, or respectability. While they are spending millions of the property of other people, they do not themselves bear one dollar of the burden. I hold in my hand and propose to read an abstract, to which, I trust, members will give their attention, and then let them say whether these are men fit to make constitutions for or impose laws upon a people.

The following statement exhibits an analysis of the taxes paid by the members of the convention and of the Legislature recently elected in South Carolina, according to the tax returns in the comptroller's office:

The total amount paid by members of the Legislature.....	$700 63
Of this amount six members pay.....	391 62

Leaving a balance paid by all other members, $309 01

Executions were issued for $140 76 of this balance, whether or not paid is not ascertained.

The total amount paid by the members of the constitutional convention.....$379 54
Of this amount one member (a conservative Democrat) pays.....$508 85
And three members pay.....210 50

719 35

Balance paid by all other members.....$160 19

Executions for $77 75 of this balance; whether or not paid not ascertained.

I have the full lists of the members of both these bodies, giving their names, the districts they represent, their color, and the taxes assessed to each, which I intended to publish with my remarks, but they would occupy too much space. I will retain them at my desk, where they can be examined by any member who desires to do so. Fifty-six of the negro delegates to the convention are not even on the assessor's books. With three or four exceptions the others only pay poll tax, and in a few instances tax on a dog—very likely a sheep killer—and the white delegates are in the same condition. Twenty-three of their number were unknown even to the assessor. Poll tax is not charged against them, and most of the others pay a mere nominal tax; and the same may be said in regard to the State Senators and members of the Legislature, as the detailed list in my possession shows. These lists are at the service of members, so that the accuracy of the statements I make may be tested.

What is here shown in reference to South Carolina is but a sample of all. I am informed by the best men in Alabama that all the white men in that State who voted for the constitution did not property enough in it to enable them to execute the bond required by law from the State treasurer.

These South Carolina papers were prepared for the purpose of laying them before this House, and to show what manner of men they were who made this constitution for that people, and to show how impossible it is for this House or any member of it, Republican or Democrat, to go before his own constituency and justify the imposing upon the people of South Carolina such a constitution as that, thus forced upon them by adventurers who hate them, and by degraded and ignorant negroes who knew nothing of what they were doing.

There were very few free negroes in South Carolina before the war; nearly all were slaves, as you know. There is not one in a hundred of them who can read or write, and yet under the constitution of South Carolina they are not only a majority of the electors, but they have elected men of their own race and color to fill three fourths of the offices in the State. Over seventy of them are in the State Legislature, and doubtless the other State offices are held by them in like proportion. Intelligence and virtue are crushed out by ignorance and vice. The proud race to which we all belong, and of whose civilization we are proud, is trampled in the dust by the debased African. Taxation without representation for the white man, and representation without taxation for the negro is the rule now in South Carolina.

"Shade of the mighty, can it be
That this is all remains of thee?"

Under that constitution the negro magistrate may, for any offenses a negro Legislature may create, fine white men any sum not exceeding $100 and imprison him not exceeding thirty days, and repeat it as often as he pleases. Speaking disrespectfully of the race, color, or integrity of the magistrate, refusing to send his children to school with negroes, refusing to sleep in the same bed with him—anything may be made the pretext for arbitrary fine and imprisonment. A more convenient mode of depopulating the State of South Carolina of her white race could not well be devised.

The Legislature has power to maintain a standing army in time of peace. This and the militia provision will enable a sufficient number of profligate negroes to be maintained as soldiers at the expense of the white tax payers to keep the white race in perfect subjection, and to eat out their substance.

The whole spirit of the proposed constitution is shown in section eight of article eight, which reads thus:

"SEC. 8. The General Assembly shall never pass any law that will deprive any of the citizens of this State of the right of suffrage, except for treason, murder, robbery, or dueling, whereof the persons shall have been duly tried and convicted."

These are crimes of which white men may be guilty, hence disfranchisement may be part of the penalty. Perjury, burglary, clandestine theft, arson, rape, the specialties of the negro race, shall never deprive the perpetrator of the right of suffrage, no matter how flagrant or oft repeated. The gentleman who prefers to settle his difficulties in private single combat rather than bring them in noisy brawl before a crowd is forever disfranchised, while the convicted perjurer, the thief, and the negro who destroys the home or the child of the white man, may, and perhaps would, in honor of the crime, be elected Governor of the State or sent to these Halls as soon as he leaves the penitentiary.

On behalf of the Democratic State central committee of South Carolina, I laid before this House a remonstrance against this constitution, which was referred to the Reconstruction Committee, and by permission of our chairman [Mr. STEVENS] Colonel Thomas, of South Carolina, advocated the views and principles therein set forth with a modesty and ability that seemed to impress even our distinguished chairman. I have that paper here. I wish I had time to read it to the House. I have not. I can only make a few extracts from it, and urge the members on both sides, if they want to understand the true state of feeling in South Carolina, and the evils this constitution would bring upon that people, to read and ponder well on the facts therein contained. Starting out by saying that the paper was prepared by the Hon. B. T. Perry, one of their best men, they present among other objections to the constitution the following, to some of which I have alluded:

"Article one, section nineteen of the Declaration of rights, gives justices of peace jurisdiction of all offenses less than felony, and in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100, or imprisonment for thirty days. This is a gross invasion of that boast and bulwark of Anglo-Saxon liberty, the trial by jury. Any one may be arrested and 'tried summarily,' before a justice of the peace or other officer authorized by law, on information under oath, without indictment or intervention of a grand jury."

"Can anything be more despotic or alarming, than the power of an ignorant, vicious negro justice to fine and imprison any and every man in the State?"

"Section twenty-four enables the Legislature to authorize and empower any one, a police or military officer, to suspend the laws of the State, or the execution of the laws! The Constitution of the United States limits the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus by Congress, even to cases of rebellion or invasion. But here the whole laws of the State, in time of peace, may be suspended by some worthless minion, authorized by the Legislature."

"Section twenty-eight clearly and distinctly empowers and authorizes the Legislature to keep up and maintain a standing army in time of peace! This alarming power is given, too, most adroitly, under the pretense that armies being dangerous to liberty, ought not to be maintained in time of peace 'without the consent of the General Assembly!' The purpose of this section is to enable the Legislature to keep up a regular force of five or ten thousand negro soldiers, to suppress and keep in subjection the white race, after the United States forces are removed from South Carolina! The Constitution of the United States especially prohibits any State keeping troops or ships of war in time of peace."

"Section thirty-three takes from the Legislature all discretion as to the adoption of the proposed amendment of the Federal Constitution disfranchising the people of South Carolina. This amendment, repudiated by Ohio, California, New Jersey, and even Massachusetts, was submitted by Congress to the several State Legislatures for their adoption or rejection, as to them should seem proper. They were to judge of its merits and decide for themselves. But this section swears them beforehand to adopt it, whether wise or unwise, just or unjust!"

"Section two of article eight enfranchises every male negro over the age of twenty-one, whether a convict, felon, or a pauper, and disfranchises every white man who has held office in South Carolina. Intelligence, virtue, and patriotism are to give place, in all elections, to ignorance, stupidity, and vice. The superior race is to be made subservient to the inferior. Taxation and representation are no longer to be united. They who own no property are to levy taxes and make all appropriations. The property-holders have to pay these taxes, without having any voice in levying them! The consequences will be, in effect, confiscation. The appropriations to support free schools for the education of negro children; for the support of old negroes in the poor-houses, and the vicious in jails and penitentiary, together with a standing army of negro soldiers, will be crushing and utterly ruinous to the State. Every man's property will have to be sold to pay his taxes."

After stating many other grave questions, the committee add:

"We have thus suggested to your honorable body some of the prominent objections to your adoption of this constitution. We waive all argument upon the subject of its validity. It is a constitution de facto, and that is the ground upon which we approach your honorable body in the spirit of earnest remonstrance. That constitution was the work of northern adventurers, southern renegades, and ignorant negroes. Not one per cent. of the white population of the State approves it, and not two per cent. of the negroes who voted for its adoption understand what his act of voting implied. That constitution enfranchises every male negro over the age of twenty-one, and disfranchises many of the purest and best white men of the State. The negro being in a large numerical majority as compared with the whites, the effect is that the new constitution establishes in this State negro supremacy, with all its train of countless evils. A superior race—a portion, Senators and Representatives, of the same proud race to which it is your pride to belong—is put under the rule of an inferior race; the abject slaves of yesterday, the flushed freedmen of to-day. And think you that there can be any just, lasting reconstruction on this basis? The committee respectfully reply, in behalf of their white fellow-citizens, that this cannot be. We do not mean to threaten resistance by arms. But the white people of our State will never quietly submit to negro rule. We may have to pass under the yoke you have authorized, but by moral agencies, by political organization, by every peaceful means left us, we will keep up this contest until we have regained the heritage of political control handed down to us by an honored ancestry. This is a duty we owe to the land that is ours, to the graves that it contains, and to the race of which you and we are alike members—the proud Caucasian race, whose sovereignty on earth God has ordained, and they themselves have illustrated on the most brilliant pages of the world's history."

Mr. Speaker, no man can read the remonstrance from which these extracts are taken and lay his hand on his heart and say that he honestly believes he is doing justice to his country and his race by forcing such a constitution on that people.

Now, sir, as I said in the outset, it is impossible to discuss the merits of these constitutions in an hour. I merely took up some of the provisions in the South Carolina constitution as specimens of what will be found in all of them, with this difference: Georgia, South Carolina, and North Carolina have been far more liberal toward the white race in the right of suffrage than Arkansas, Alabama, or Louisiana have been. Arkansas and Alabama have been before the House heretofore; let me look for a moment at the provisions governing suffrage in the proposed constitution of Louisiana. They are as follows:

"TITLE VI.—General Provisions.

"ART. 98. Every male person, of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, and a resident of this State one year next preceding an election, and the last ten days within the parish in which he offers to vote, shall be deemed an elector, except those disfranchised by this constitution, and persons under interdiction."

"ART. 99. The following persons shall be prohibited from voting and holding any office: all persons who shall have been convicted of treason, perjury, forgery, bribery, or other crime punishable in the penitentiary, and persons under interdiction. All persons who are estopped from claiming the right of suffrage by abjuring their allegiance to the United States Government, or by notoriously levying war against it, or adhering to its enemies, giving them aid or comfort, but who have not expatriated themselves, nor have been convicted of any of the crimes mentioned in the first paragraph of this article, are hereby restored to the said right, except the following: those who held office, civil or military, for one year or more, under the organization styled 'the Confederate States of America'; those who registered themselves as enemies of the United States; those who acted as leaders of guerrilla bands during the late rebellion; those who, in the advocacy of treason, wrote or published newspaper articles or preached sermons during the late rebellion; and those who voted for and signed an ordinance of secession in any State. No person included in these exceptions shall either vote or hold office until he shall have relieved himself by voluntarily writing and signing a certificate setting forth that he acknowledges the late rebellion to have been morally and politically wrong, and that he regrets any aid and comfort he may have given it; and he shall file the certificate in the office of the Secretary of State, and it shall be published in the official journal: Provided, That no person who, prior to the 1st of January, 1868, favored the execution of the laws of the United States popularly known as the reconstruction acts of Congress, and openly and actively assisted the loyal men of the State in their efforts to restore Louisiana to her position in the Union, shall be held to be included among those who are herein excepted. Registrars of voters shall take the oath of any such person as prima facie evidence of the fact that he is entitled to the benefit of this proviso.

"ART. 100. Members of the General Assembly and all other officers, before they enter upon the duties of their offices, shall take the following oath or affirmation: I, A. B. do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I accept the civil and political equality of all men, and agree not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men; that I will support the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the constitution and laws of this State, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent on me as according to the best of my ability and understanding; so help me God."

The reconstruction acts allowed all men to register and vote who would not be disqualified from holding office by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. Neither editors, preachers, guerrilla leaders, registered enemies, nor persons who voted for secession are excluded, yet this constitution excludes them all unless they become political renegades. Who is to decide as to the character of the editorials written or the sermons preached seven years ago. But it is useless to elaborate. The whole thing is in a nutshell. Everybody is disqualified who will not indorse the conduct and vote for the elevation to offices of honor and profit of the men who controlled the negro vote and were using it for their own selfish purposes under the specious pretense of loyalty. When men did that all their sins were forgiven, and they were allowed to come in and vote on every question; the men who had taken control of the negro vote, who were determined to be elected to this Congress and to go to the Senate of the United States, to be elected Governors, judges, and legislators, also determined that there should be no free vote unless it was cast for them; and whenever it was signified that one of these excluded men would vote for them and sustain their policy, no matter how obnoxious he may have been or how false his pretenses might be, no matter whether he honestly agreed with or had sold himself out to them, all his disabilities were removed, and he stood purified and washed clean by reason of supporting them for the offices they are seeking.

That is the political history of the franchise clause in the constitution of Louisiana. Substantially the same provision in regard to education prevails there as in South Carolina. Taxation the most enormous, compulsory education of girls and boys at the same school with the negroes. They are all mixed together. A poor man cannot help himself. It is made a penal offense, or the Legislature has the power, and it is its duty to make it a penal offense, to refuse to allow them to associate together at the common schools. The man who is rich enough may employ a teacher of his own choice, and if he does so the compulsion ceases. But such has been the impoverishment at the South, as gentlemen well know, that few of the most intelligent and respectable people are really able to afford the means of education such as they used to afford, and they will therefore be compelled to send their children, whether they are willing to do so or not, to these mixed schools. I can scarcely conceive of a more despotic, galling, and degrading provision in the fundamental law of a State pretending to be free.

A MEMBER. Nine tenths of them will have to do it.

MR. BECK. Perhaps nine tenths; I do not wish to speak extravagantly.

But the clock warns me that I must hasten on. In the States of North Carolina and Georgia the conventions that framed the constitutions removed the disabilities from all men except such as the Constitution of the United States prohibits from voting. They made the franchise universal. And yet when they came to elect the officers provided for by that Constitution large numbers of men who were qualified by the Constitution itself were prohibited from voting. Every man who had not been able to register last October was excluded from the right of suffrage. Thousands of men in both these States who had a right to vote for or against these officers were kept away from the polls by the managers controlling them, although the Constitution itself provided that they should have the right to vote. Why? Simply because it was known that if they were permitted to do so they would vote for the men who controlled the negro vote of these States. To show that I am not making reckless assertions I call attention to a letter which I have in my hand—and I suppose many of the members of the House have it also—written by Hon. Daniel R. Goodloe to Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, setting forth all these facts as existing in the State of North Carolina. I use it in preference to similar information from Georgia, because he himself, as he avows, was an original abolitionist, and was in favor of the largest civil and political rights of the freedmen, and therefore entitled to the confidence of the majority on the other side of this Hall. Yet in this letter he confesses the fact to be that such have been the frauds in carrying on the elections under the constitution in North Carolina that none of the candidates who have been elected to any of the offices, either as Governor, State officers, members of the Legislature, or of this House, are entitled to their seats or ought to be allowed to take them, because they were only elected by having excluded thousands of qualified voters from the polls.

I will read a few sentences from that letter, preferring it to any statement of fact that I might be able to make.

After speaking of his own position and his desire to elevate the negro as far as it could be consistently done, and of the many objections to intrusting all the emancipated slaves with the right of suffrage, especially if many intelligent whites were disfranchised, he adds:

"Meantime I doubt not that your a priori reasonings on the subject will bring you to the conclusion that the intelligent property holders of North Carolina ought not to be denounced as incorrigible traitors for having voted against a constitution which is so well calculated to place them at the mercy of depraved and ignorant demagogues."

"The military commander is a gentleman for whom I entertain great respect. I doubt not he intended to perform his duty merely; and I have no suspicion that he was a conscious party to the scheme for depriving a large body of the most intelligent qualified voters of their rights. The plan was probably regarded by him as a mere form, and was doubtless concocted here in Raleigh, in order to make sure the election of certain aspirants to office. Without it they were doomed to certain defeat. With it they had reasonable grounds to anticipate success. By a general order the convention ordinance was approved; and it further directed that the votes for ratification for Congressmen, and for State officers, should all be written or printed on one ballot and cast into one box. This arrangement, though highly inconvenient and admirably calculated to prevent a fair expression of the popular will, might nevertheless have been legitimate, or at least bearable, if the voters qualified by the constitution were identical with those qualified by the reconstruction acts. But such is not the case, as appears from the following article of the new constitution:"

After quoting the suffrage article in the constitution, which I need not read, he goes on to say:

"I see not how any man of ordinary candor can read the foregoing article without being forced to the conclusion that the convention, by giving a superficial construction to the last amendatory act of Congress, has authorized the holding an election for Congressmen and State officers in violation of the Constitution—the work of their own hands. The body was doubtless betrayed into this course by certain cunning party leaders, who, failing, after the most earnest efforts, to ingraft their proscriptive principles in the Constitution, determined to cheat a large part of the voters out of their franchise until they could be provided with snug offices for a long term of years. It will be noticed that the terms of office of the Governor and other State officials is four years, which is twofold longer than heretofore, with the latter half of the present year thrown in to the first term. Thus, while the people are enfranchised in the constitution, they are defrauded of their rights for the first four years. Our disinterested patriots have thus 'held the word of promise to the ear, but broken it to the hope.'"

He thus speaks of the operation of the reconstruction acts in North Carolina:

"They embrace the constitutional amendment as a part of the policy of reconstruction; and to insure its adoption, and to secure a loyal majority in the States, two other conditions were annexed to the terms of restoration. The right of suffrage, as well as the right to hold office, was taken away from the governing class, and at the same time every negro and person of African descent in the ten States was enfranchised. I confess I thought these hard conditions. The utter incapacity of the negroes to exercise the elective franchise with discretion and for the best good of the State was manifest. But it was believed that at least they would be true to themselves, and that they would vote for none but avowed friends to their rights. I never doubted them on this point, even when the demagogues who now lead them on to the destruction of whatever was venerable and valuable in the institutions of the past were afraid to trust them, and opposed their enfranchisement. The trouble is that they will vote for any man who makes a noisy demonstration of devotion to their rights, without the slightest regard to his past public career or to his private character; and the result is, that they have placed the control of the State and its affairs in the hands of men who rose to eminence or notoriety as the champions of slavery and secession, or to wealth as dealers in slaves. I regret to say, also, that they elected quite a number of their own race to the late convention, and again to the Legislature, most of whom could not stand an examination before a Massachusetts committee empowered to ascertain the educational qualification of voters. Men have been elected as judges of the circuit court who obtained their licenses to practice law within six months past. One of the "judges" is said never to have been licensed as a lawyer; and others, on account of character and qualifications, would be regarded as presumptuous if they should aspire to the office of justice of the peace in a well ordered and enlightened community. Still others, of both races, have been elected to office, who have been either convicted of or indicted for murder and other infamous crimes. The number of felonious aspirants for office, with their success and failure, would form a curious statistical inquiry. The vindictive partisan may exclaim that the rule of such men will be good enough for rebels. But the statesman, whose reputation for all time will rest upon the wisdom and success of his measures, must act on more generous principles, if he would have his name held in honor by future generations."

He quotes from Mr. Burke this sentence, which this House would do well to consider:

"There is no qualification for Government but virtue and wisdom, actual or presumptive. Wherever they are actually found they have, in whatever state, condition, profession, or trade, the passport of heaven to human place and honor. Woe to the country which would madly and impiously reject the service of the talents and virtues, civil, military, or religious, that are given to grace and to serve it; and would condemn to obscurity everything formed to diffuse luster and glory around a State. Woe to the country, too, that, passing into the opposite extreme, considers a low education, a mean contracted view of things, a sordid, mercenary occupation, as a preferable title to command."

I will make only one other quotation:

"But the new constitution of North Carolina guarantees equal civil and political equality to both races. None are disfranchised, except such as have been or may be convicted of crimes. The injured people, therefore, have a right to ask and to expect that the elections for State Legislature, State officials, and members of Congress be set aside, on the ground that they were not held in accordance with the national and State constitutions, and are therefore null and void. In the name of violated constitutions and outraged rights they demand that a new election be ordered in which the whole body of qualified voters shall be allowed to participate."

"THE POLL-KEEPERS AND REGISTRARS."

"I have thus far made no allusion to the character of the persons selected to hold the elections, nor to the method of their appointment. You are aware that the whole proceeding has been conducted under military supervision; and that the choice of registrars and poll-keepers was necessarily confined, under the law, to the class of persons who can take the 'iron-clad' test-oath. There are few counties in the whole South where such citizens of intelligence and character could be found to perform these duties. The consequence has been that soldiers, transiently doing duty here or recently discharged, strangers who have come in since the war, and illiterate freedmen, have been called upon. They are almost invariably of the dominant party and strongly prejudiced against those who oppose the policy of Congress. It would be a miracle if an election held under such circumstances were fairly conducted. The poll-keepers and registrars should be of the people, and each party should be represented at each polling place, in order to secure honesty and fairness. It is impossible that strangers, if we suppose them to be honest and intelligent, can know the people sufficiently well to prevent fraudulent registration and voting. If I am correct in these views, they go to prove that the military regulation of elections should be carried no further than is absolutely necessary; and that the initial step of ratifying the constitution being completed the intervention should cease as a matter of public right and expediency, apart from the considerations above stated, which demonstrate the unconstitutionality of State elections held by order of the General Government."

I have read this much to call the attention of the House to a paper written by a man who not only opposes the Democratic party, but is as true a Republican as any man in this House can pretend to be, setting forth all these facts and calling upon the House to come to the relief of the people of North Carolina and reject the men who have thus been foisted into office. If you will frame a constitution for them—as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] by his amendment in one particular proposes to do—frame a constitution yourselves under which they can live, and treat them as civilized men, and do not surrender them over to a horde of adventurers and barbarians who are wholly unfit to exercise any political rights.

Now, sir, nothing is more pregnant of the fact that you know that these men under whom you have put the South are not fit to exercise political rights and privileges than the fact that there are two bills before this House, one of which was passed the other day removing disabilities from five hundred and sixty rebels in North Carolina whom you had to pardon in order to fill the offices in the State. You had not men enough—intelligent men, men who can read and write—to put the machinery in motion until you passed a bill pardoning five hundred and sixty rebels who have been elected to office by your political friends because they could not do without them. And there is another bill printed and on your tables proposing to pardon five hundred and forty-one rebels in the State of Georgia, which you must pass before the machinery of the State government can be put in motion there, because there are not intelligent men enough there who are capable of filling the offices who are not under these disabilities.

Mr. BROOKS. Does not my colleague make a mistake in saying that there were five hundred and sixty names in the bill which we passed? Why, it was announced on apparent authority on the floor of the House that there were only two hundred.

Mr. BECK. There are the names of five hundred and sixty men included in that bill which we passed the other day. I have counted them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. When I was asked how many names there were in the bill I said I thought two hundred, more or less. I did not state the exact number.

Mr. BECK. I know that I am correct, for I have counted them myself. And, independent of that, this additional fact stands out: that General Schofield, in his address to the Virginia convention, and General Meade and General Canby have all declared that if you adhere to the test-oath and require men to swear that they will for all time maintain the political equality of the races, the governments cannot be carried on in any of these southern States, and that your whole plan is a failure. The outrage is so great that these commanders themselves, placed there for the very purpose of carrying out these measures, have to appeal to the rulers here to remove disabilities from these men. Little wonder the intelligent Legislature of Ohio instructed their Senators and Representatives to take the back track on all these measures.

In the few minutes I have remaining I desire to say that while in accordance with the requirements of the reconstruction acts the proposed constitutions all fasten universal, unlimited, and perpetual negro suffrage on that people, I submit to members whether they can now, as faithful Representatives of the popular will, with any sort of propriety, force negro suffrage on the people of the South as a condition precedent to their restoration to civil and political rights after they have received such emphatic instructions from their own constituents everywhere that it is abhorrent to all their ideas of American civilization. In March, 1867, it was, perhaps, uncertain whether the American people, or at least the Republican portion of them, represented by an unprecedented majority in these Halls, did not desire, or would at least consent, to establish universal suffrage, regardless of race, color, or previous condition, and Congress determined to make the experiment, imposing it by power and force on the southern States under the specious pretext of its necessity to insure and perpetuate loyalty there, though they knew that it was not only repugnant and abhorrent to the whole white population, but was, because of the great number of blacks, actually putting the whole machinery of the Government into the hands of a body of men as unfit to exercise political powers as so many horses or mules would be. Congress then knew that even if the black race was by nature the equals of the white, their ignorance, their past condition of slavery, which had utterly deprived them of all means or desire for obtaining knowledge of any sort, especially all knowledge of self-government or the government of others, rendered them wholly unfit to be the depositories of political power; and so knowing, they placed their Freedmen's Bureaus, their military satraps, and all the machinery of party over them and the whites alike, making the poor, degraded, and ignorant negro, under the pretense of exercising his newly-acquired rights, the mere agent and tool to carry out their will and purposes. The men they send to these Halls will be in no proper sense either their representatives or the representatives of the States from whence they come, but the mere puppets of Congress, looking to it, and to it alone, for a continuance of their powers, and therefore subservient followers of the dominant majority, to whom they are indebted for all they are and all they hope to be.

All this, of course, was in a mere party sense considered an element of power, and it was doubtless thought, and not without a show of reason, that the Republican party in the country would adopt and indorse the action of Congress and carry out the principles in the northern States wherever the party was in the majority. The question was therefore made in many of the northern States. Ohio was considered Republican to the core; Kansas, Minnesota, and Michigan were unquestionably so. The number of negroes in each was so small that there could be no possibility of danger that they would ever control the party. Many of the negroes there had been born free. They had had all the advantages of education and association among a people who sympathized with and endeavored to elevate them. Every man thus made a voter would, they knew, certainly vote for and sustain the Republican party and its candidates. The strength thus acquired might, in closely contested elections, turn the scales and secure the offices. Yet, with all these inducements, each and all of these Republican States, by majorities not to be misunderstood, rejected the proposed amendments to their constitutions, rejected negro suffrage, spurned the proffered accession to their ranks, and preferred to suffer defeat and the overthrow of all mere measures of party policy on which their organization depended by their Democratic opponents rather than recognize the right of the negro race to take part in the political affairs of the country. They have declared in thunder tones that this is a white man's Government, was so from the beginning, and that the white people of the country, disregarding all other differences, are determined that it shall continue so through all time. All the animosities engendered in the terrible war through which we have passed, and which have been fostered and kept alive by the Radical party for partisan purposes, are discarded and spurned by the people when the negro is sought to be put on a level with the white man, and so it will always be whenever and wherever men are free and determined to remain so. I am almost ashamed to quote authority on such a proposition, but the great debate between Judge Douglas and Mr. Lincoln brought out their views so sharply on this question that I will quote them:

"Judge DOUGLAS. I hold that this Government was made on the white basis, by white men, for the benefit of white men and their posterity forever, and should be administered by white men, and none others. I do not believe that the Almighty made the negro capable of self-government.

"Mr. LINCOLN, in reply. I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor intermar-rying them with white people, and I will say, in addition to this, that there is a physical difference between the white and black race which, I believe, will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality; and inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together there must be a position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. I have no time.

Mr. HIGBY. Only a question.

Mr. BECK. If I had time I would do so; but I really have not the time. If I am allowed five minutes more after my time is out I will answer the question.

Mr. HIGBY. I wanted to ask the gentleman what he would do with the negro.

Mr. BECK. I will tell the gentleman what I would do with the negro. I would protect him as a free man, as I would protect our women and children, or any other person who had not the capacity for exercising political rights. I would hold the negro unfit for political rights, as we do the Indian and the Chinaman, for a great variety of reasons. His whole race has shown itself in all time unfit for self-government. The Caucasian race alone has developed that power, and that only under favorable circumstances, by the growth of centuries and by education up to a point which we think we have reached. Many of the races even upon the continent of Europe and Asia are yet unfit for self-government. And to say that the negro, inferior in all time past, shall be taken from the rice, cotton, and sugar plantations of the South in absolute ignorance, degraded, as the Republicans always claimed, to the level of the mule he drove—to take him from that condition and place him above his former master, degrade, debase, and disfranchise the white man, and put above him a man who has not an idea what to do except to follow the bidding of the demagogue who seeks to use him—to do that is an outrage upon the white race to which we belong, and one which the people of this country never will permit.

I would protect the negro in all his rights, but I would hold him unfit to exercise political rights. I will go as far to protect him in his civil rights as any gentleman from New England will go. And the men of my State, as much as they have been slandered upon that subject, will and do go as far in protecting and defending him as any set of men in America. If gentlemen will go there now they will see the negro as happy and better protected and better cared for than in any other State, North or South, in spite of all the efforts of demagogues to make it otherwise.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BECK. I cannot yield further. When Michigan, Minnesota, Kansas, and Ohio refused to give the negroes any political rights, how can gentlemen representing those States now seek to fasten that policy upon the people of the South?

Having made the experiment under the most auspicious circumstances and fairly tested it in the free States—I mean in the States where men were free to act and to decide—and your own people having everywhere discarded your attempt to establish negro suffrage, with all the inducements and temptations you could hold out to them, it does seem to me that as faithful Representatives of the people, whose will you know and whose instructions you have received, after a full and fair submission of the question to them by yourselves, you have no right to place the white men of the South under the domination of the negro, no right to use the coerced and ignorant negro vote in the South to neutralize the free, intelligent vote of the northern and western States, for this is really not a vote, but an indirect and efficient mode of stuffing the ballot-boxes of the North, as flagrant, when fairly looked at, as burning up all the ballot-boxes in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Indiana would be. These three great States having about the same electoral votes as the five military districts in the South, would it not be more manly, equally just, and present your claims more intelligently, if you would allow the ten States embraced in those districts to remain, as the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] says they now are, waste, outlying provinces, conquered territories, till after the November election, and send your bureau agents or other suitable emissaries into the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Indiana, on the first Tuesday in November next; and in the presence of all the people thereof burn up the ballot-boxes and ballots, on the claim that you have a right to deprive the Democratic candidate for the Presidency of that number of votes, to set off the political power of these territorial dependencies which you claim to own and control by right of conquest. The people would understand that issue and have something to say about it; yet that is precisely what you are doing now in an indirect way, and the people are beginning to open their eyes to the truth of it.

I know this Congress thinks it is omnipotent. It is nearly so. It has acted as though it was, in spite of the decision of the highest judicial tribunal in the land; a tribunal made coördinate in power and authority with Congress by the Constitution; a tribunal erected as a barrier against legislative usurpation on the rights of the States and the people; a tribunal whose exposition of the Constitution has always been deemed to be binding and conclusive on all the departments of the Government. Congress in these so-called reconstruction acts, in time of profound peace, nearly two years after the last hostile arm had been raised, and long after it, by its own legislation, recognized the war as ended, subordinated the civil to the military power, suspended the habeas corpus, struck down the trial by jury, declared all civil government at an end, and in all things civil and political substituted its will and orders, and the will and orders of its agents for the will and the acts of the people themselves. It can impeach the Chief Executive Magistrate, elected by the people, without cause or because he is an obstruction in its onward march to power. It can withdraw the authority from the Supreme Court to question any act of outrage committed by its servants on any of the people of the South. In short, it is almost omnipotent, or seems to be so. But there is one appeal left. Presidents, courts, States, and citizens may be stricken down by those in power, but the servant is not above his master; he has to retire after a term from these Halls, and give an account of his stewardship to those who sent him. The majority here will then find before that court of last resort that all their acts will be reversed and annulled; that the Constitution is still the supreme law; that all their doings here are known and disapproved; that this is a white man's Government, and because they have sought to subvert it they have been weighed in the balances and found wanting. The handwriting is upon the wall, the Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin is seen and understood; and the guilty Belshazzar did not tremble more at the recorded verdict of offended Heaven than do the Radical leaders now, when called to face an indignant and outraged people whose trusts they have betrayed, whose liberties they have sought to subvert, and whose rights they have trampled under foot in violation of their known and expressed will.

The people will take the matter into their own hands. They will want to know why ten States of this Union are kept under a military despotism and prevented from contributing their share toward the revenue of the country. They will want to know why millions of white people are disfranchised and millions of dollars are taken out of the Treasury for the purpose of holding them in armed subjugation to the ignorant negroes. They will do away with your reconstruction laws, your conquered provinces, and your disjointed Union. They will remove the obstructions from these Halls. They will insist upon the restoration of the equality, liberty, and fraternity, of a white man's Government, from whose administration the negro and all his advocates shall be excluded.

I see that my time is out. I have stated my objections imperfectly, for the reason, first, that we are without the information called for from the Secretary of War and the General of the Army; secondly, because of the great mass of matter and the short time in which I have been compelled to consider it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. I have surrendered the floor, but I will answer the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes left.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand the gentleman to base his argument chiefly on his denial of the right of the black man to participate in the Government. I ask him if the black men were to vote the Democratic ticket whether he would not somewhat mollify his objection to their participation in the Government?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; not in the slightest.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss the main topic now under consideration, but to notice a reference to Ohio made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. BECK.] He claims that it is obligatory on the Ohio delegation in this House to take his view of this bill, because our Ohio Legislature has lately sent resolutions here instructing or at least requesting all the Ohio members of this House to vote against all the reconstruction bills. Now, I admit we ought to pay great deference to the expressions of opinion of our State Legislatures, provided those Legislatures are by their conduct entitled to our respect. While I repudiate the doctrine that a State Legislature has a right to give any binding instructions to the members of this House, I still admit that we ought to listen with respect to all respectable Legislatures. But in answering the gentleman's argument, I raise the question whether the present Democratic Legislature of Ohio is entitled by its character and conduct to instruct any Representative in Congress. In order to settle that question, I beg leave briefly to cite a few of the leading acts of that body. We will then be able to see whether they are entitled to the confidence or contempt of this body and of the country.

By some strange inscrutable dispensation of Providence—perhaps to make the victory of the party of freedom more certain at the next election—for the first time in ten years the State of Ohio has been cursed by a Democratic Legislature, and it became Democratic by a very small majority. Although the Republicans carried the Governor and State officers, yet, by the arrangement of representation provided for in the State constitution made by the Democratic party when they were in power, it so happens that they were enabled to get a majority in the Legislature this year. That Legislature assembled, and one of its first acts was to take from the Lieutenant Governor the power which that officer has exercised for many years, of appointing committees in the the State Senate, and put the appointment of all the committees into the hands of the Senate itself, thus making all the committees very strongly Democratic. Of course, they also made all the committees in the House strongly Democratic, so that every committee in the General Assembly now speaks only the voice of the Democracy of the State.

The first legislation of any importance was an act pretending and attempting to withdraw the consent of the State of Ohio to the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution which, among other things, prohibits forever the assumption of any part of the rebel debt, and the repudiation of any part of the Federal debt. Of course, the act is a nullity, but it nevertheless exhibits the temper, spirit, and character of that Democratic Legislature.

The next thing of any considerable importance that they did was to remodel the municipal laws of the leading Republican cities of the State so as to force upon them a Democratic police. For instance, the city of Cleveland, with an overwhelming Republican majority, has been compelled by that Legislature to receive a police system not of its own choosing, but in the highest degree offensive to its citizens.

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman's remarks, not being pertinent to the question before the House, are not in order. The Legislature of Ohio represent the people of that State.

Mr. UPSON. I call the gentleman to order. A point of order is not debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BOYER in the chair.) The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. This subject was really the wire on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] strung his speech. I am, therefore, directly responding to the gentleman's argument. After foisting upon these Republican cities an unwelcome and partisan police the Legislature proceeded to act upon this very subject of colored suffrage which is now under discussion.

Mr. MORGAN. I insist that the gentleman shall confine himself to the subject-matter before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman should confine his remarks to the subject before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will undertake to do that. The chief point that has been discussed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is the question of negro suffrage in the southern States, and he has illustrated his argument by reference to the action of the Legislature of Ohio on that very subject. Now, I want to say what that legislative action has been on the question of voting, and negro voting, too, and that certainly cannot be out of order. The Legislature of my State has sent instructions to me and to my colleagues in regard to the subject of negro suffrage. Now, that Legislature has passed a law on the subject of negro voting, which shows the temper, spirit, and meaning of our instructors. To discuss that law, I hold, is strictly in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I call the gentleman to order. I shall be happy at the proper time to discuss the action of the Ohio Legislature with my friend, but this is not the proper time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken, inasmuch as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] made allusions in the course of his speech which justify the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am much obliged to the Chair. It has long been the undisputed decision of the supreme court of Ohio that any person who has more white blood in his veins than black blood is entitled to vote under our constitution, in which the word "white" occurs as limiting the suffrage. That decision was made in the better days of the Democracy by a Democratic bench, and has been, I believe, undisturbed and unquestioned for thirty years.

Now, the present Legislature passed a law known as "The visible admixture law," which provides that any man having a visible admixture of African blood shall not be permitted to vote; and in order to test who it is that has a visible admixture of African blood in his veins, that not being a fact which always appears on the surface and to the naked eye—since complexions differ so much—that law provides:

"That it shall be the duty of the judges of election to challenge any person offering to vote at any election held under any law of this State, having a distinct and visible admixture of African blood, and shall tender to him the following oath or affirmation: 'You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will, to the best of your knowledge and belief, full and true answers make to such questions as may be put to you touching your qualifications as an elector; and thereupon the said judges, or one of them, shall put to him the following questions: 1. What is your age? 2. Where were you born? 3. Were your parents married, and did they live together as man and wife? 4. Had your parents, or either of them a visible and distinct admixture of African blood? 5. In the community in which you live, are you classified and recognized as a white or colored person, and do you associate with white or colored persons? 6. Are there schools for colored children in operation in the township, village, or ward in which you live, and if you have children do they attend such schools, or do they attend the common schools organized for white children under the law of the State?

Sec. 2. After the examination of the person challenged, as provided in the preceding section, the judges of election shall, unless the vote of said person is rejected, require him to produce before them two credible witnesses, to whom shall be tendered by said judges the following affirmation: "You and each of you do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will fully and truly answer all such questions as may be put to you, touching the qualifications of (the name of the person challenged) as an elector." Thereupon the judges, or one of them, shall put to each person respectively the following questions: 1. Are you acquainted with (the name of the person challenged); if so, for how long a time have you known him? 2. Do you know when, where, and in what State he was born? 3. Where you acquainted with his parents, or either of them? If yes, did such parents, or either of them, have a distinct and visible admixture of African blood, and were they married, or did they live together as man and wife?"

Sec. 4. No evidence shall be received as to the admixture of white blood which is based on the opinion of the person challenged or of the witness testifying in his behalf, founded merely upon appearance, unless the facts are fully stated as to the parentage of the person challenged; and no evidence of reputation as to the parentage shall be received, unless the parties about whom such reputation exists are proved to have been married."

Now, after this inquisitorial test, which may be applied to every citizen of the State, black or white, if he is enabled to trace his pedigree, if he is able to do more than wise children usually can, and say, not only who was his father, but who were his paternal and maternal ancestors; if he can pass this ordeal safely he may then be permitted to deposit his vote.

But the Democracy of Ohio did not stop there. Knowing very well that wherever patriotism and education are paramount there is but small hope for them, they passed a law forbidding any student in the college and academies of Ohio, if not a permanent resident of the place where the institution is located, the right to vote. Now, there are twenty-nine or thirty colleges in the State of Ohio, and it is very well known that nine tenths of the students in all the colleges, academies, and high schools in the State are Republicans, and vote with the Union party; and this Democratic Legislature have attempted to put out the light by depriving the mass of Ohio students of all share in the legislation of the State.

As a fit companion to this law, that Legislature passed another which every member of this House ought to know. The General Government has located at the city of Dayton, Ohio, a Soldiers' Home, in which we have gathered, not only from Ohio but from neighboring States, a large number of crippled, disabled soldiers. There are now nearly one thousand such soldiers at that Home, sustained by the Government of the United States because of wounds and disabilities incurred in the late war for the Union.

Now, knowing very well that these men would vote as they fought, that they would stand with the same party when they came to the ballot-box that they stood with when they were in the field, this Democratic Legislature has passed a law forbidding any inmate of the Soldiers' Home from voting at any election in the State. The Soldiers' Home is to be their home for life; it is not a mere temporary residence. They are disabled pensioners of the Government—kept there in the Government asylum; and this Democratic Legislature of Ohio says that not one of them shall ever vote at any election in the State. And the managers of that Soldiers' Home, one of whom sits near me, are receiving letters from soldiers in other States of the Union, saying that they had intended to apply for admission to that home in Ohio; but since this law has passed they would prefer to beg their bread from door to door rather than have their rights as loyal voters of this country thus trampled upon by a Democratic Legislature.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I would ask my colleague if he knows a single State in this Union that permits students at college to acquire a residence and a vote simply from being such students at college?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say to the gentleman that so far as I know for the last twenty years students in the colleges of Ohio have been permitted to vote.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; and they have voted in violation of an express statute every year they have so voted there.

Mr. GARFIELD. That question will probably come up in the gentleman's own election case, and I will postpone any argument upon it until that time.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a remark upon this point?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will.

Mr. PAINE. Having myself been a citizen of the State of Ohio, and having been a student in that State, I know of my own knowledge that the laws of the State of Ohio have been construed so as to allow students to vote. That is, where a student enters a college for four years he acquires, under the laws of the State of Ohio, that sort of residence that entitles him to a vote.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] allow me to say a word upon this point?

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. MILLER. I will also say that it has been decided in several States of this Union that students going to college for the purpose of getting an education there have the right to vote.

Mr. MORGAN. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand my honorable friend to say that a student does not acquire the right to vote when he is attending college merely for the purpose of obtaining an education.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will ask my colleague—

Mr. MORGAN. I beg my colleague's pardon. I have propounded him a question. Will he answer it?

Mr. GARFIELD. I say this: that if the chief business of the student is to get an education, and he has been at the college long enough to acquire a residence as prescribed by the law, he is a voter there. That has been the practice in the State of Ohio for twenty years.

Mr. MORGAN. Another question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. Does not the law require an actual bona fide residence at the election precinct to become a voter?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. If the simple object of the residence is to acquire an education, with the intention to leave the place when the education has been acquired, is the student then a legal voter?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is according to the intention of the student. I now wish to ask the gentleman, if his view of the law be correct, then what was the object of passing the law of this year?

Mr. MORGAN. Because certain persons have heretofore set the law at defiance; and to prevent that willful and deliberate violation of law we have passed an act which they cannot evade.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear my colleague's explanation of this matter. This new-born zeal of the Democratic party for the purity of elections is one of the most beautiful chapters in the history of that party. Viewing the whole question of the "visible admixture" law, the soldiers' asylum law, the students' voting law, and the accompanying acts ancillary thereto, it is certainly one of the most striking and characteristic chapters in modern Democratic history.

Now, in order to secure all the benefits of these laws for the next election, so that the supreme court may not remove them from the statute-book on account of their unconstitutionality, a law is now pending in that same Democratic Legislature forbidding the supreme court to take up any case out of its regular order; in other words, forbidding the supreme court to advance a case on the docket; for if the court should exercise this right which it has exercised ever since the State was founded, of advancing an important case on the docket, the gentleman's party know right well that the students' voting law, or at least the visible admixture law, would be swept at once from the statute-book as unconstitutional. By this means that Democratic Legislature proposes to tide over the coming presidential election, well knowing that both the law and the makers of it will be swept away when our next election takes place.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask my colleague one question. If the Republican party, of which the gentleman is so distinguished a light, desires that the elective franchise shall be conferred upon the negroes—that the negroes of the South shall exercise political domination over the white men there—how comes it that the people of Ohio, the Republican party being in the majority there, have by a majority of fifty-five thousand decided that the negro is unfit to exercise the elective franchise, and refused to extend it to him?

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that my colleague has called my attention to that point. A few timid members of the last Legislature of Ohio, who had not quite nerve enough to meet a great question on its merits, framed that constitutional amendment in such a shape that the suffrage question was not squarely before the people. They tacked on a clause proposing to disfranchise deserters and those who ran away from the draft. It so happened that a great many soldiers who were borne on the rolls as deserters were only technically deserters, not really so. Such men felt the injustice of the disfranchising clause; and this single fact, I have no doubt, turned the scale on that question.

But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, notwithstanding all the clogs attached to that amendment, nearly two hundred and twenty thousand of the citizens of Ohio voted for it; and I have no more doubt that a provision guarantying equal suffrage in that State will be ultimately adopted by Ohio than I have that we shall carry through the great measures now before this body.

Mr. MORGAN. My distinguished colleague has said that the reason a majority of fifty-five thousand votes was polled in the State of Ohio against negro suffrage was that there were so many deserters. By that remark I understand him to imply that there were in the Republican party fifty-five thousand deserters who would not vote in favor of negro suffrage, because thereby they would disfranchise themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I say no such thing; but I am perfectly free to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Republican party, like all other parties of virtue and progress, has in its ranks here and there weak and timid men, who cannot quite come up to the measure of a great, bold, righteous issue. If the world were a little better than it is, if we had a little more enlightenment throughout the State of Ohio, if we had fewer men unable to read and write, if we had more men who have been in the Army and drawn in the inspiration of the great war through which we have passed, if we had fewer Democrats to appeal to the prejudices and interests of the people, fewer George H. Pendletons to whisper in their ears flattering financial schemes, fewer men to offer them the bribe of indirect repudiation as the prospect of a Democratic future, I admit that, with such advantages, we should have carried the recent election and secured impartial suffrage in our State in spite of all the obstacles which impeded it.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I ask the gentleman for the proof that George H. Pendleton is in favor of repudiation. Where is the proof?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not go into that discussion now. I did not say that he was.

I have only one more thing to say. To make "assurance doubly sure" this Democratic Legislature of Ohio has introduced and is trying to pass—and I expect the telegraph will soon bring us the news of its passage—a bill to take from the hands of the Governor and adjutant general of the State the arms and ammunition of the State and intrust them to the hands of a committee of this Democratic Legislature of the State of Ohio. All these operations are going on in that State, and there is no doubt that the next election will be sure to give us our old overwhelming majority.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. That is a thing I am in favor of myself. I second that bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I supposed so. Who ever doubted our distinguished judge from Ohio would not indorse all these measures? Their work in Ohio and their work here are parts of the same great scheme. They are all of one piece.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be said upon these occasions; whatever may be done now in the heat of passion or of party spirit; whatever subterfuges may be resorted to on the other side to secure party supremacy in the future, I believe that all these unconstitutional measures, these mere partisan measures, these efforts to keep up a party condemned and repudiated by the people, will fail and fail forever; and that hereafter the march of that grand army of the people, the true Republicans of this country, now surging on toward Washington, will brush away all these partisan subterfuges and place the Government under the control of a party that is in precept and example true to the great interests of the country. Then, sir, the wicked schemes planned and matured for the degradation of the South and the destruction of our constitutional liberty will vanish and "leave not a rack behind." Then, sir, all your impeachment proceedings will be expunged from the record. You and I, and all here upon this floor, will see the manuscript Journal produced in this Hall and black lines drawn around the articles of impeachment; and deep condemnation will be set upon those who aimed that deadliest blow at our system of Government. I have no more doubt that will take place than I have of the existence of the gentlemen around me.

Mr. Speaker, what are we doing? We are here now called upon to vote several of the old States into the Union. When did those States get out of the Union? Was it Jeff. Davis that took them out, or have the gentlemen on the other side dared to do what he failed to accomplish? Who can restore a State which is not out of the Union? Every one of these States mentioned in this bill has been and is now in the Union. The Constitution expressly declares that every State is entitled to representation upon this floor; and South Carolina is as much entitled to representation as any other State. She is now as much entitled to representation here as New York, Massachusetts, or Pennsylvania. The Constitution says that every State shall be—not may be—entitled to at least one representative upon this floor; and shall be entitled to two representatives in the Senate. If seven years ago any man had prophesied that we would be legislating now to bring back these States into the Union; if, when the hearts of the people, Democrats and Republicans, were beating in unison to preserve the Constitution and defend the Union, any one had said that in six or seven years we would be legislating to bring these States back into the Union, he would have been looked upon as a fool or hanged as a traitor. Billions of money and hundreds of thousands of lives were sacrificed upon the gory field of battle rather than that one star should fade from our flag, or one State should ever be torn from our Union.

Sir, it was not to abolish slavery that the war was fought; and I say that the Republican party have no claim upon the colored population of this country for anything they ever did for them. I deny to them any credit on that score. I stand here to-day maintaining the same principles that I always maintained as a Whig—a Henry Clay Whig—while I can go around this Chamber and put my hand on members A B and C who were anti-negro Locofocos of the worst stripe, who were persecuting the negro when I was advocating the rights that belonged to him. I was opposed to slavery when these men who are now trampling down our institutions and shouting for the negro were in favor of slavery.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Who has changed, you or the other gentlemen?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is hardly fair for the gentleman to put that question, for I do not know what were his former politics. If he will tell me whether he voted for Clay or Scott, I shall be prepared to answer his question.

A MEMBER. He was a Democrat.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Have the Democrats changed or have you?

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no doubt that the Democrats now on the Republican side have changed, and the gentleman among them. Sir, I can illustrate this matter by saying that I went to Massachusetts on one occasion to speak for Robert C. Winthrop, formerly Speaker of this House, who, when "Richelieu," of the New York Tribune, was expelled from this floor by Democrats, very many of whom have since turned Radicals, for describing the eating of sausages, voted against the expulsion. In addition to that, at the very next session he moved that "Richelieu" should be readmitted to the floor, which was carried. Mr. Winthrop was running for Governor of Massachusetts, and I went up there as an old Clay Whig to speak in favor of his election. I found running against him the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWEN,] who at that time had not traveled into infinite space, but was living quietly at Groton. His principal manager was B. F. BUTLER. I suppose we all have heard of him, [laughter,] now one of the managers of this House, and a badly managed crowd we are. [Laughter.]

In the city of Lowell Mr. BUTLER and myself agreed to meet and discuss the questions at issue in that gubernatorial contest. We met in wordy, not deadly, conflict. As a great many people wanted to see and hear him and, perhaps, me, on the occasion, it was necessary to have a large hall to accommodate them. They took the railroad depot for that purpose. Two chairmen, one chosen by each, were to preserve order. I chose Dr. Huntington, a venerable Clay Whig, then mayor of the city of Lowell; Mr. BUTLER chose Mr. Hildreth, then sheriff of the county. We got into the railroad depot, chairmen and combatants, and they put us on a platform car. There was a great crowd and great noise. I was afterward informed that two or three groceries had been open and free drinks had been given, and there was the happiest and noisiest crowd you ever saw. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN WYCK. I rise to a question of order. Time cannot be given when matters are to be discussed in this House which merit discussion. I would like to know of the Chair what is the question before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A bill relating to the admission of certain States to representation.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I ask if the gentleman's remarks are in order?

Mr. ROBINSON. If my colleague objects, I must decline to answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILSON.] I was endeavoring to answer him, and for that purpose alone got somewhat away from the strict question before the House.

I was saying that they were the happiest looking lot of individuals you ever saw; they could scream louder and were more locofocoish and locomotivish than any meeting I had ever before attempted to address.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Did the Chair decide that the gentleman is in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decided that the gentleman from New York might proceed in order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Was he in order in the remarks he was making when I raised the question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks he was not out of order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very well; I only wanted to know the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not wish to trespass, but I understood I might go on by general consent to finish this recital by way of answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Cries of "Go on."] We got on the platform car, and this happy crowd that had consumed the contents of two or three groceries—I do not charge that upon the gentleman from Massachusetts; it was the first time I ever had the pleasure of seeing his smiling face—pushed this car up against one end of the depot. There were India-rubber springs at the end of the car—I do not know what you call them. My distinguished friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES,] who knows all about railroads, can tell me the technical name.

A MEMBER. Bumpers.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, bumpers. They "bumped" the car from one end of the depot to the other, so that we, the two combatants, and the mayor, and the sheriff had to leave the building through a window.

I have told this story to say that Robert C. Winthrop and I were then Whigs, and both are to-day with this side of the House in favor of what I call the doctrine of Heaven: forgiveness, mercy to the fallen; and that the other party, who were then all locofocos, are on the other side of the House, advocating what I call the doctrines of hell—yelling for vengeance and screaming for blood. If Henry Clay, and Daniel Webster, and Willie P. Mangum, and J. J. Crittenden, and John M. Clayton, and all the great and good leaders of the old Clay Whig party of that day, were here now, they would be against these partisans who, with their eyes shut and their ears closed against all reason, are running a race of destruction which if not checked by the people will end in the total destruction of all free republican institutions in this country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say that he could not perceive, when the point of order was made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] whether the gentleman was in order or not until he made the application of his remarks. The Chair thinks the gentleman should confine himself a little more closely to the bill before the House.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to ask the gentleman, who seems to be very full of forgiveness, if he is willing to forgive the prince of darkness for carrying away a third part of heaven in rebellion?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, sir; nor would I like to have him pardoned by a two-thirds vote, as seems to be the rule here. But if the prince of darkness had to be taken back or restored, as is now proposed to be done with our rebellious States, he would be forgiven. I do not see the application of the question, and it is not out of any want of respect if I fail to answer it more at length.

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILSON,] who asked me a question, is not fully answered, I have before me a book which will show who has changed and who are traitors to their formerly avowed principles.

Mr. PILE. I insist that this discussion is out of order, and that the gentleman must confine himself to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. This is entirely germane to the subject, as gentlemen on the other side will see. They are too impatient. We are in no hurry at all on this side of the House. We can wait and listen to truth. Now, let us see who has changed. We have a bill before us which, among other things, provides that South Carolina, North Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama shall be admitted to representation in Congress as States of the Union when the Legislatures of said States shall respectively duly ratify the amendment to the constitution, &c.

We will admit them as States hereafter when they do something as States which must be done before they become States. I know nothing so ridiculous as that, except a series of resolutions drawn up at some western meeting. It was first unanimously resolved that a new jail should be erected for the accommodation of the people of the whole county. Then they resolved unanimously that the materials of the old jail should be used in the erection of the new one. And then, lest the prisoners should escape while the new jail was being erected out of the materials of the old one, it was unanimously resolved that the old jail should stand until the new one was constructed. Here it is proposed that these States shall not be States until they have done that which States alone can do. We will admit them as new States when they act as old States, needing no admission. They are the new States to be erected out of the materials of the old States, and the old States shall stand and act till the new ones are constructed!

The very language of this bill recognizes them as old States now competent to do an act which only States can do, to wit, to ratify an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. And then it says they shall not be States until they do that which they cannot do until they are States.

Now, I hold that the change of principles in public men upon those subjects, notwithstanding the objection upon the other side, is very pertinent to the issue. I have before me the Tribune Almanac, published by Horace Greeley, whom I saw with pleasure on the floor of this House a few minutes since. It gives the platform of the Republican party—of the Lincoln party. Mr. Lincoln, had he lived, might not have changed as radically as some of his political friends, and would probably be under impeachment about this time. This platform was adopted at Chicago in 1860, and I make the suggestion to the other side, kindly and with the best intention in the world, to embody what I now read in the platform of their party, to be adopted on the 20th of this month at this same Chicago. I will read the fourth resolution, from page 30 of the Tribune Almanac for 1861:

"That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions"—

Which the bill now under consideration proposes to wipe out completely—

"according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends; and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

That was adopted by the party which nominated Mr. Lincoln. Who are now the deserters from the Lincoln standard? Where are now the hosts who marched with him under that banner, saying in hoc signo vinces? They have not left a shred of that banner or a splinter of that platform under and upon which, by false pretenses, they obtained the votes of the people.

I have here another illustration of the same fact. Andrew Johnson was a Senator of the United States at one time, and so was Jefferson Davis; and we are now trying Andrew Johnson while we are letting Jefferson Davis go. You cannot kick the party in power into coming to time on the trial of Davis. The restless leaders of that party know that Jefferson Davis was the originator, or at least the champion, of the idea that a State can be taken out of the Union. They feel an interest in him because they are but his successors in that respect. With all the crimes they charge upon him, they do not want to try him, much less to hang him. And why? Because he was the originator of their principles, and they do not want to become parricides. He was the first man to defend in arms the treason that a State can go or be out of this Union. I said it was treason in him. What name shall we call it in those who openly proclaim that doctrine which we hope had fallen with him, but which is revived in this bill?

Andrew Johnson, faithful now and ever true to the people against disunion, stood up for the Union when others were unfaithful—when the "carpet-baggers" and the "trooly loil" fellows now figuring in the South were joining Jefferson Davis in the crusade against the Union. One of the men who now take a prominent place among the Radicals of the South, I am informed, drew up the ordinance purporting to take one of these States out of the Union. Radicals of this character have all gone over to join a party apparently doomed "to believe a lie, that they may all be damned together."

Sir, when the masses of the people, upon the firing on Sumter, were aroused and hung out their flags upon their house tops and from their windows; when they rallied to go down to the South to fight for the salvation of the Union, their object was not to secure to the negro the right to vote, nor was it to punish the South. It was simply to maintain that no State should ever be taken by any means out of the Union, and therefore should never need readmission. Sir, I will say—and this will serve as a further answer to the question, who has changed?—that if at any of the meetings in the North any one speaking by authority had dared to proclaim the sentiments embodied in this bill not a half dozen men could have been found in the whole North to come down to save Washington from destruction.

And, sir, I will say that if Jefferson Davis had been elected President at the time when Abraham Lincoln was chosen he would not have proposed such extensive alterations in the Constitution as have been made by those who were placed in power upon the pledge of preserving the Constitution. I say deliberately that if Jefferson Davis had succeeded, even through rebellion, in getting possession of the Government, and had been installed as President, the Constitution of the United States would not have been so much mangled and trampled in the dust as it is to-day. And, sir, it is a sorrowful thing for those who supported the measures claimed to be necessary for the preservation of the Union, and only justified by that object, to find that a political party has got into power by false pretenses, and that the instrumentalities which should be used to preserve the Union are exerted to crush it, and that above the graves of our fallen heroes it should be proclaimed that their blood, shed to keep every State in the Union, had been shed in vain.

Sir, in 1861 a resolution was offered in both Houses of Congress simultaneously, or almost so. It was presented in the Senate by Andrew Johnson, and in this House by a distinguished son of Kentucky, John J. Crittenden. And it was adopted, only one man opposing it, he doing so silently. Sometimes "silence gives consent," but this gentleman, a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, says that in his case it did not. He has acknowledged, in replying to a remark made by Hon. Mr. Dixon, of Connecticut, that he was in his seat when the resolution was passed and that he did not vote against it.

I will read the resolution that was then adopted on motion of Mr. Crittenden. It is resolved—

"That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States, now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion and resentment, will collect only its duty to the whole country."

The resolution was divided, and that was the first branch of it. The next is as follows:

"That this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States"—

That, of course, referred to the institution of slavery in the southern States—

"but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union"—

Including South Carolina and these other States which it is now proposed to admit into this Union, States which I hold have never been out of the Union—

"and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

But we are told now that this was not the object of the war; that union was not what we sought to preserve, but that the object was to perpetuate the sway of the party in power; that every other interest of the people and the country should give place to the necessities of its supremacy; that it was not the supremacy of the Constitution, but the supremacy of the Radical party.

Now, who voted for the second branch of that resolution? I find the names of FERNANDO C. BEAMAN, SCHUYLER COLFAX, and ROSCOE CONKLING. They can be found on page 125 of the House Journal for the first session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress. I find the name of HENRY L. DAWES. I think I have heard that name somewhere. I think he is the same gentleman who, in conjunction with a distinguished gentleman in the other end of the Capitol, heard "a lion in the lobby roar" precisely at the same time. I have heard a gentleman, who was skilled in acoustics, and who examined these lobbies, say that it was not a lion that made the noise but another animal, and that after all, such are the deceptive acoustics of this building, that it was only the echo from either Hall that was heard. [Laughter.]

But to proceed. I find the name of James F. English. He is a Democrat, and he stands to-day where he stood then. Do the others so stand?

Next comes the name of WILLIAM D. KELLEY; a name I have heard before. FRANCIS THOMAS. That is another name not unfamiliar. Charles H. Upton, BURT VAN HORN, CHARLES H. VAN WYCK. They all declared that the war was waged to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union, and yet here we are with ten States out of that poorly preserved Union.

I find here a resolution that is pertinent to this question. It was adopted by the Republican State convention of New York in 1865, which I will read from the Tribune Almanac of 1866, page 44. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That while we regard the national sovereignty over all the subjects committed to it by the Constitution of the United States as having been confirmed and established by the recent war, we regard the several States in the Union as having the jurisdiction over all local and domestic affairs reserved to them by the same constitutional authority."

"Resolved, That we approve, as eminently wise and just, the sentiments of kindness and confidence which President Johnson has evinced toward those of the communities and individuals lately in rebellion." "That we approve the initial steps which he has taken toward relaxing the bonds of military authority in the southern States;" "and that we confidently look forward, under his wise and patriotic administration, to the establishment of more cordial relations, of greater mutual respect, and of a stronger interest to each others welfare between the northern and southern States than have hitherto prevailed."

Similar resolutions of confidence in Andrew Johnson, and in favor of State rights under the Constitution, were passed by Republican State conventions held in 1865 in the States of Ohio, Wisconsin, California, Nevada, &c., as will be found in the same Almanac—all this after the war was over, and after President Johnson had indicated his policy. Now, who has changed? Those who vote for this bill of abominations which takes away all power from the States "over their local and domestic affairs," or we who vote against this bill, and stand by principles written in numerous Republican platforms?

Mr. PAINE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to say, as the question has been put to me, that it is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction to call for the previous question on this bill to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. ROBINSON. We have heard a great deal said here on the subject of negro suffrage. I have already said I do not yield to those who have sloughed off from the Democratic party the right to dictate to me as a true republican. I deny the authority of any man spotted over with the worst kind of locofocoism to dictate to me anything on this subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the gentleman tell us whether the Democratic party now is the same Democratic party that existed in the days of Henry Clay, to whom he has referred.

Mr. ROBINSON. No, sir; I know all about it. Most of the leaders of the Radical party were in the Democratic party in the days of Henry Clay.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Then I would like the gentleman to answer the question I put some time ago: whether he has changed or the Democratic party?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is evident that the leaders of the Radical party have changed. I have said so already. I have just shown by authentic documents that they are not only deserters from the Democratic party, but deserters from their own platforms.

Mr. WOODWARD. I protest that I belonged to the Democratic party in the days of Henry Clay, and I belong to it now.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true; but the worst part of the party turned away and left it so pure that the Whig party had no difficulty in joining it. I see my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and another distinguished friend over on this side, [Mr. BROOKS,] and I see all around me those who belonged to the Whig party. Indeed, I rather think the majority on this side are old Whigs. Then on the other side you find the very worst set of locofocos. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Not all.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not all, to be sure. There are a few righteous, straight old Whigs among the Radicals, but the leaders are the deserters from the Democratic party. Sodom would not have been destroyed if there had been a few righteous. [Laughter.]

Perhaps I cannot better illustrate the change of parties on these questions than to read for the edification of some of my friends on the other side from a speech of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] made on the 6th of February, 1861, page 165, Appendix to Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-Sixth Congress:

"Mr. Speaker, I do not design to be unkind. I shall try to be serious, and I mean to be respectful. I beseech you, gentlemen, to look at your own party."

A MEMBER. What was he then?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know. He is, I believe, a truthful man. I will not take as much liberty with his name as if he were here. He says he acted with the constitutional party. I believe he was an old Whig. He says:

"I beseech you, gentlemen, to look at your own party, if you have never done so, and see of what heterogeneous elements it is composed. Old Whigs and old Democrats; followers of Thomas Jefferson, admirers of Alexander Hamilton; friends of Jackson, friends of Clay; masons, anti-masons."

Sir, if I had time to branch off here, I could give a chapter on anti-masons, who got us into a great deal of trouble, because a great deal of feeling is gotten up against some masons.

A MEMBER. What about Thurlow Weed?

Mr. ROBINSON. He is nearer your party than ours, and perhaps among the best of yours.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman should address the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am trying to address the Chair, but as I have to reply to gentlemen behind me it is in a round-about way. [Laughter.] But let me proceed with the reading of the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD:]

"Barnburners," "hunkers," "renters," "anti-renters," "wooly heads," "silver greys," "Know-Nothings," "Americans, foreigners, Catholics, protective-tariff men, free-trade men, bank men, bullion men, Radicals, Conservatives, and so on."

A MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well:

"Men of all grades of political sentiment, all shades of political opinion, all bedded together, heads and heels, covered by a single blanket, and that woven of African wool. Such is the dappled hue of the party that has inaugurated itself to the head of public affairs, and is about to take the Government into control."

That was the opinion of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. When was that?

Mr. ROBINSON. February 6, 1861. I presume he was as truthful a man then as he is now. I do not want to say anything against the gentleman from Tennessee, but how it is that he has got to be pulling at the bizarre corner of the "African wool" blanket and crawling under it himself I do not stop to inquire; but there he is.

I shall only read one more extract to show what this party is and what a distinguished gentleman thinks of it who went up to convert New England Puritans, and who is now in this city; he is a personal friend, a distinguished man, who deserves well of his country, having served it faithfully; I refer to Daniel E. Sickles. In the House of Representatives on January 17, 1861, (Appendix to the Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-Sixth Congress, page 88,) he said:

"The Government of the United States has become Puritan and proscriptive; it has ceased to be catholic and tolerant, as it was formed, and has continued from the administration of Washington down to the election of Lincoln. The vital element of our political system has ever been the equality of the States."

If that were admitted now we would not be talking on this bill to-day—

"and from this follows the corresponding duty of non-interference with their local institutions, and the recognition of the right of every citizen to equal privileges in the Territories. The essential characteristic of Puritanism is the employment of the powers of Government to compel a uniform recognition of the opinions of the majority in all things. The Constitution of the United States imposes no test upon the institutions of a State or Territory except that they shall be republican. It was designed for a confederation, embracing every element of civilization which could be developed under republican institutions."

Here comes the point that I wanted particularly to refer to:

"The triumph of the Puritan element of the North involves the probable destruction of the federative principle of the Constitution and the consolidation of the Government under the absolute power of a majority, which is one of the forms of despotism."

That was the opinion of Daniel E. Sickles since the war commenced.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. That speech was made before Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated, in January, 1861.

Mr. ROBINSON. That may be; but at what date did South Carolina go out of the Union?

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. In April, 1861.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that is so I am mistaken; but I thought, and still think, it was before that. But, at any rate, everybody knew what was coming.

Mr. NIBLACK. South Carolina seceded on the 20th of December, 1860.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought it was earlier than my colleague stated. Now, whether General Sickles was right or wrong in these views I do not mean to say. I have no prejudice against the Puritan element any more than I have against the negro element. And upon this subject of the negro element, let me say that I heard yesterday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] say, and he said it with the emphasis of ten thousand decisions of the Supreme Court, that the negro had fought nobly for the country that owed him so little, and did not aid the rebellion. Where does he get his knowledge on that subject? I want to read an extract on that point to show that the negro stood up for what he considered right; and let me say that I honor him for it. I do not mean to say, as gentlemen upon the other side of the House insinuate, that the negroes have not the feelings of men. If I had belonged to a party that had insulted the negroes as the Republican party has done, I never would open my lips on that subject until I had gone for seven years into sackcloth and ashes and mourning. Sir, the gentlemen on the other side induced the negroes to come into the war for the suppression of the rebellion, and, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, they flocked to our standard by thousands and tens of thousands.

Did our Government ever permit one single negro to get an honor upon the battle-field? What colored man upon the field of battle was ever raised to the rank of captain or breveted colonel or brigadier general or major general? What colored man has ever received that stamp of approbation? Do they treat him thus because the negro race is inferior? That is the deduction from the course of the Republicans on this question, because if the negro is not inferior to the white man he would have stood a chance for preferment upon the field of battle. But did they let him have it? Was not his blood, when poured out upon the battle-field of liberty, as red as theirs? Yet the leaders of that party now in power, with that hatred of the negro race which was born in their flesh and bred in their bones, would not allow them to give a star or a badge, or even a ribbon, upon the battle-field to the negro. Nay, more; this Republican party did not even allow one of these negroes to command a company of themselves. And when the thousands and tens of thousands of negro troops went forth to battle for the Union, the leaders of that party would not give to the negro even the poor privilege of leading them, as captain or colonel, to the deadly breach in which they fell.

Now, I say that if I was so deeply damned with hatred and injustice to the negro as the party who did this thing, I would go into sackcloth and ashes for seven years and repent, before I would commence to blarney him.

And I say now that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] who spoke yesterday, declaring that these negroes were all upon the side of the Union, said that which was not a historical fact. He might have learned better from the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who lives in Lowell, [Mr. BUTLER,] but who does not represent that district—I forget what district he does represent—

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. The State at large.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is very good; may I not add the country at large.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. Does the gentleman want to know why the Republican party did these things?

Mr. ROBINSON. I know why: they did not care anything for the negro. They only wanted their own party brought into power by the blood of the negro.

Mr. HIGBY. No; it was not that. They yielded somewhat to the great hue and cry of the Democratic party against the negro.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, should the negro love them for that? I have no doubt that to accomplish his ends the gentleman will try and "blarney" the negroes, and make some sort of explanation why the Republicans heaped this indignity upon them. I go in for doing justice as I go along. Now, about this matter of brevets. It was owing either to the injustice of those managing the war or the inability of the race that the negroes did not obtain distinction in that way.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman himself recommended any colored man for a brevet?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; because you would not let any colored man be in a position where he could be breveted. They were to fight and die, and you were to get the loaves and fishes and honors.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I understand that there were colored officers in the first negro regiments. I ask the gentleman if he ever recommended to Andrew Johnson to brevet one of them? If he will do so, I will sign such a recommendation with him.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the recommendation would not amount to anything, for the nominations from one end of the avenue stand no chance of confirmation at the other. I will now read for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] some extracts from a history of the rebellion by Mr. McPherson, another Pennsylvanian, (page 282,) in relation to the conduct of the negroes during the war:

"A dispatch from Charleston, dated January 1, 1861, from R. B. Riordan to Hon. Perry Walker, at Mobile, describes the preparations for war, and contains this closing paragraph:

"Large gangs of negroes from plantations are at work on the redoubts, which are substantially made of sand-bags and coated with sheet-iron."

A Washington dispatch to the Evening Post says:

"A gentleman from Charleston says that everything there betokens active preparations for fight. The thousand negroes busy in building batteries, so far from inclining to insurrection, were grinning from ear to ear at the prospect of shooting the Yankees."

The Charleston Mercury of January 3, 1861, announced—

"We learn that one hundred and fifty able-bodied free colored men of Charleston yesterday offered their services gratuitously to the Governor to hasten forward the important work of throwing up redoubts wherever needed along our coast."

In April, 1861, the Republican, published in Lynchburg, Virginia, announced—

"We learn that about seventy of the most respectable free negroes in this city have enrolled themselves, and design tendering their services to the Governor to act in whatever capacity may be assigned them in defense of the State. Three cheers for the patriotic free negroes of Lynchburg."

A letter in the Petersburg (Virginia) Express, dated at Norfolk, April 23, 1861, says:

"The negroes in all this section of the country, slave and free, are as loyal as could be desired. They freely proffer their services to the State and zealously contend for the privilege of being allowed to work on the batteries. Yesterday General Gwynn declined the services of three hundred from Hampton who solicited employment on the batteries, and twice and thrice that number could be obtained in this city and vicinity in a single day, if it was thought advisable to accept them. Indeed the entire fortifications of this harbor might be constructed by the voluntary labor of negroes, who would claim no higher reward than the privilege of being allowed to contribute their share toward the defense of the State and the protection of their masters and mistresses, who had always extended a sheltering hand over them."

So I might go on reading from the work which I hold in my hand—McPherson's History of the Rebellion—and show that the negroes were singing songs in the streets of the southern cities and shouting what short work they would make of the Yankee invaders. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL]—I do not know for what end—said yesterday that "no black man was ever found willingly fighting in the ranks of the enemy."

Now, sir, I do not blame the negro for taking part in the rebellion. If there are any men in the world whom I despise, they are the men in the South who hid under beds and behind petticoats when a fight was going on. The southerners were fighting for a wrong idea, but one in which they heartily believed; and the negroes, like other men in similar circumstances, flocked to their standard, fought with them, and would have conquered with them, had that been possible.

Mr. Speaker, when I arose I intended to make some remarks with reference to the absorption of all the powers of the Government in Congress. The executive and the judicial branches of our Government have been pretty nearly reduced to nothingness. And, sir, an illustration occurs to me. When, during the riots in the city of New York, that gallant Irishman and Democrat, Captain O'Brien, in defending the stars and stripes, was struck down by the mob—a mob almost as savage as a radical mob—he appeared to be dead, the blood gushing from his mouth and nostrils; but the mob watched to see whether there was breath enough in his body to raise a bubble about his face; and whenever the slightest sign of lingering life appeared the big boot of some brutal fellow struck him again in the face so as to insure his death. And, sir, I have frequently been reminded of this when I have seen the blows dealt by the Radical party at the executive branch of our Government. When this, one of the most honored parts of our institutions, has, by virtue of repeated blows, lain apparently lifeless, this party has watched for the slightest bubbling of breath, and if any appeared has dealt another and more deadly blow to guard against any lingering of life.

This party has invaded also the judiciary department, the Supreme Court of the United States. If a judge ventured to whisper an opinion antagonistic to the party in power a committee has been appointed to investigate the matter and take measures for his impeachment. And when that gallant soldier, whose sword during the battles of the late war shook more glory from its flashing blade than any of all the others who poured their beams upon the battle-fields from the beginning to the end of the war—the soldier whose sword was the lightning flash dancing through and illuminating the thunder-cloud of war—dared to express an opinion which was patriotic, this House jumped like the murderers of O'Brien to kick the life out of him. Whenever there is any sign of life in favor of the old Constitution this party eagerly steps forward to crush it out. What will be the next step? The executive and the judicial departments, both of which were designed by the creators of our Government to be checks upon the legislative will, have been annihilated. These departments were formed for the very purpose of being checks or obstructions upon the power of Congress. So were the two Houses formed to be checks upon each other. How long will it be till the Senate shall receive the attack of the Radical party as an obstruction to the will of the people's more direct Representatives?

It was not supposed that anybody would be so wild as to say they would remove the check, take off the "drag" from the Democratic coach, and let it sweep down hill into a wild carnival of Radicalism. But this Radical spirit will not pause on the destruction of the executive, judicial, and other balances of our institutions. The infuriated animal which once tastes blood thirsts for more; when this Radicalism has absorbed the executive and judiciary the Senate may prepare itself as the next victim.

Mr. ROBINSON. I supposed I had more time. I have only answered objections, and was proceeding to more important matters which I wish to discuss concerning the southern States, and which must now be reserved for some other occasion.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is too much to ask the majority of this House, as it is now our usual hour for adjournment, to let this question go over until to-morrow, when I should much prefer to say what I have to say than now. I do not want more than half an hour.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Let us go on for half an hour this evening. It is now only four o'clock.

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to have ten minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. I will give them to the gentleman out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand there was any formal understanding that the vote should be taken to-morrow after the reading of the Journal, or that the previous question should be called this evening. When that was proposed the gentleman from New York stated that any such arrangement was not with the consent of his side of the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. When the gentleman from New York is through I will call for the previous question, and the vote can be taken in the morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from New York will yield to me, I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BROOKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Pending the adjournment,

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a list of clerks appointed since April 1, by whom recommended, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

And then (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The remonstrance of A. Kilbourn and 4 others, citizens of Glastenburgh, Connecticut, against the erection of a railroad bridge over the Connecticut river at Middletown and Portland.

By Mr. ALLISON: The petition of Mary E. Berry and Louisa Berry, asking for increase of pension.

Also, a memorial of Joseph A. Rhoneberg, accompanied by draft of a bill, asking for relief.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of Jay A. Hubbell, H. McKenzie, C. E. Raymond, and 150 others, of Lake Superior, praying Congress for an appropriation to deepen the channel of the Sault Ste. Marie river between Lake Superior and Lake Huron so as to admit the passage of large class vessels.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of Henry Russell, praying that he may be allowed to continue to occupy a house at Harper's Ferry belonging to the United States.

By Mr. McCARTHY: The remonstrance of Colonel Edwin Jenny, Lieutenant Colonel J. M. Gere, and other officers who were in the Union service during the late rebellion, against Congress passing laws as to the commutation of servants' wages, now before the Supreme Court.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 14, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE P. VAN WYCK, of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JUDGMENTS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, statements of judgments obtained in the Court of Claims and paid by the Treasury Department, the amount of each judgment, when paid, &c.; which was referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

IOWA AND MINNESOTA LAND GRANTS.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1064) to extend the limits of certain land grants in Iowa and Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

POST ROAD.

Mr. VAN AUKEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1065) to establish a post road; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

DUTIES OF GLOBE REPORTERS.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on the Rules. It is not done for the purpose of complaint against the reporters for the Globe, but in order to define their duties, which are not now defined by any strict rule upon the records of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the reporters for the Congressional Globe to report in full each distinct proposition, motion, resolution, or bill, and each amendment or modification thereto, or substitute therefor, offered for the consideration of this House by any Member or Delegate.

There was no objection; and the resolution was received and referred to the Committee on the Rules.

SALE OF SITE OF FORT COVINGTON.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution (H. R. No. 264) to provide for the sale of the site of Fort Covington, in the State of Maryland.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was received and read a first and second time. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to sell, after thirty days' notice in two daily papers of the city of Baltimore, a certain tract of land belonging to the United States, situate within the limits of Baltimore city, on the Patapsco river, Maryland, known as Fort Covington, containing about two and three quarters acres, more or less, with all the tenements, rights, and privileges pertaining thereto; and that the proceeds of such sale, after first defraying the expenses of the same, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. That joint resolution is based upon the following letter of General Grant:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, January 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to send herewith, for the consideration of the proper committee, a draft of a joint resolution having for its object the sale of the site of Fort Covington, in the city of Baltimore, Maryland, and to recommend its passage by Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT,

Secretary of War ad interim.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARFIELD. This recommendation was made by the War Department, and the committee have reported it unanimously. The property is not now in use, and is of no value whatever to the Government, but will sell for some money.

Mr. PAINE. I wish the gentleman to inform the House how long since this property has been in use.

Mr. GARFIELD. It really has never been in use by the Government. It has been owned by it for a long time, and the Government does not want to use it. The War Department say they have no expectation that they will ever need it. The resolution as sent from the War Department by General Grant provided that the money should be taken by the War Department for use in any fortifications that hereafter might be built for Baltimore, but the committee have modified it by providing that the money be paid into the Treasury. The joint resolution directs that thirty days' notice of the sale shall be published in the daily papers of Baltimore. The Government never built any fort on the land. It was the intention to build one, and the intended fort was named in advance Fort Covington. The site is a sand beach running out into the water, and it is sometimes covered by water. No buildings have ever been erected on it. Gentlemen best acquainted with the property are entirely satisfied that it ought to be sold.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman why it is not offered at public auction instead of being sold at private sale, as directed in the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not a private sale; it is to be advertised. The committee are of opinion that the waste lands which the military department of the Government does not need had better be sold.

Mr. CHANLER. I am only asking why the manner of sale is not made at public auction, whereby the value of the property can be tested by competition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would be entirely willing to have that modification.

Mr. CHANLER. I offer that amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. But I think thirty days' notice given in two daily papers will call all the public attention necessary. The War Department and the committee believe that the proposed arrangements for the sale are ample.

Mr. CHANLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that the House is expected to receive the proposition made by the War Department as a perfect thing? I think the resolution should be modified so as to meet the usual practice in the sale of lands.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee have modified the proposition as made by the War Department.

Mr. CHANLER. Why not modify it as I suggest?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think it had better be modified. In the first place, I would strike out the directory part of it, and then authorize the sale to be made at public auction to the highest bidder.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I am entirely willing.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to know if the gentleman is sure there is no guano deposit on the sand bank? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot tell about that.

Mr. CHANLER. We have had some very serious questions about that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amendment that I propose is to strike out the word "directed," so as simply to authorize the Secretary of War to sell, and then to insert the words "at public auction to the highest bidder."

Mr. GARFIELD. I accept the modification.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to modify it in another respect, so that it may come within the provisions of the act of March, 1849. It provides that all the proceeds of the sale shall be paid into the Treasury "after defraying the expenses of the sale." I propose to strike out the latter words.

Mr. GARFIELD. I accept that modification.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the joint resolution will be modified accordingly.

No objection was made.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, as it is no doubt his desire and the desire of the House that a proper price shall be obtained for this property, that the resolution be so modified as to authorize this tract of land to be sold in parcels, if that mode of sale would result in obtaining the largest amount of the whole tract.

I would also suggest that it be so modified as to require the advertisement of the sale to be inserted in five daily papers instead of two, including the German paper of the largest circulation in the district, the object being to give the sale as much publicity as possible among that class who would be glad to compete for the property.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that to advertise the sale in so many papers would be to incur unnecessary expense. It seems to me that two papers would be sufficient.

As to selling the tract in parcels, I think that may safely be left to the Department, who have no other interest than to obtain the largest amount they can from the sale. If that is the best method, they can adopt it; but that may not be the best way.

Mr. PHELPS. I only want to leave it discretionary with the Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is discretionary now.

Mr. PHELPS. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as amended, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, after thirty days' notice in two daily newspapers in the city of Baltimore, a certain tract of land belonging to the United States, situate within the limits of the said city, on the Patapsco river, Maryland, known as the site of Fort Covington, containing about two and three quarter acres, more or less, with all tenements, rights, and privileges pertaining thereto, and that the proceeds of such sale shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to insert after the word "sell" the words "in entirety or by subdivisions."

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will consent to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I now move to strike out "two" and insert "five," so as to provide that the advertisement shall be inserted in five newspapers.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not press that amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. On the general principle that governs business men in all large transactions, I think the greatest publicity should be given to this sale.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will make his amendment "three daily papers, including one German paper," I will not object.

Mr. PHELPS. I will accept that modification.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROUTES IN OHIO.

Mr. BEATTY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1066) to establish post routes in Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

TELEGRAPH LINE TO PUGET SOUND.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1067) to establish telegraphic communication between military posts, and for the construction of a telegraph line to Puget sound; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted indefinitely to Mr. HAWKINS after to-morrow.

GEORGETOWN AND WASHINGTON RAILROAD.

Mr. VAN WYCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be directed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the Georgetown and Washington Railroad Company to run their cars at greater speed, and to report by bill or otherwise.

RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. ECKLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1029) to repeal a portion of an act entitled "An act to revive and extend the provisions of an act granting the right of way and making a grant of lands to the States of Arkansas and Missouri to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point upon the Mississippi river opposite the mouth of the Ohio river, via Little Rock to the Texas boundary near Fulton, in Arkansas, with branches to Fort Smith and the Mississippi river," approved July 28, 1866.

Mr. ECKLEY. I will simply say that the bill provides for repealing that provision of the act referred to which requires the company to carry the property and troops of the United States free of charge. The committee report against it. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called for, reports are in order from the Committee of Claims.

TAX SALES IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon Senate bill No. 79, to confirm certain sales made by the direct tax commissioners for South Carolina to persons in the Army, Navy, and Marine corps, and for other purposes; and the bill was laid on the table.

WILLIAM WEHLE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported adversely upon a memorial in the case of William Wehle; and the same was laid on the table.

TIMOTHY LYDEN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 445, for the relief of Timothy Lyden, of Parkersburg, West Virginia.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Timothy Lyden, of Parkersburg, West Virginia, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $302, in compensation of services rendered the quartermaster's department, and for a period of captivity in rebel prisons.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read.

The report was read. It states that the petitioner is a loyal citizen of Western Virginia, and on the 1st of May, 1864, was employed as a teamster in a Government wagon train with supplies for troops at Winchester, West Virginia. The train was attacked by an armed body of rebels, who captured the petitioner as well as the train. He was held in captivity as a citizen employé of the United States Army by the so-called confederate government, first at Danville, Virginia; next at Andersonville, Georgia; and finally at Florence, South Carolina, from which place he was sent to Charleston, South Carolina, and exchanged on the 15th of December, 1864. From Charleston he was sent to the hospitals at Annapolis, Maryland, and Washington, District of Columbia, by the United States military authority, for treatment for diseases contracted in confederate prisons, and was finally discharged March 2, 1865.

The report further states that when the train was captured the teamsters and employés captured therewith were not reported to the quartermaster, who thereby failed, either from neglect or want of knowledge of the fact, to report their names on the proper rolls with his monthly return to the Quartermaster General. The petitioner, as a teamster, was therefore never taken up nor paid as the regulations of the War Department provide, and his only relief is by a special act of Congress. The claim of the petitioner is for thirty dollars per month from date of employment to his discharge from the hospital at Washington. It is presumed that the medical department would not have placed him in the hospital at the time of his exchange if his condition had not demanded it. It is not a violent presumption that an imprisonment of nearly eight months in rebel prisons would so reduce a teamster physically that he could not drive a six-mule team and Army wagon with safety. Thirty dollars per month was the compensation allowed for that service by order of the War Department. In reporting the claim of the petitioner the Committee of Claims remark that it appears that the petitioner is an honest and loyal person, with capacity and experience as a teamster; that the service upon which he was engaged was a necessary and patriotic duty, for which good men were as necessary as for line of battle; that, being captured while actually performing his duty, he suffered the horrors of eight months' imprisonment, and was consequently sick and disabled for two months longer.

The report further states that by the regulations of the War Department he cannot be paid in the quartermaster general's department, where his service was rendered. The committee therefore recommend that the sum of $302 be appropriated for the payment of his claim, and to that end report the accompanying bill.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE CALVERT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee of Claims to report adversely upon the memorial and accompanying papers of George Calvert, of Prince George's county, Maryland, praying relief and compensation for the destruction of his ferry at the village of Nottingham, on the Patuxent river. This is a claim which was reported upon favorably in the Thirty-Seventh and Thirty-Eighth Congresses. Upon a reexamination of those papers the Committee of Claims find that the statements in the report made to the House were not correct, but wholly erroneous. The committee evidently made a mistake before. They now report adversely upon the claim. I ask that the report be read.

The report, which was read, states that it is claimed that on the 11th of September, 1861, Lieutenant Hoag, with nine men and seven horses of a Kentucky regiment of cavalry in the service of the United States, undertook to cross the river by the memorialist's ferry, the boat being managed by Richard Canter, a colored man and an indentured servant of the memorialist; that by reason of the overloading of the boat and the plunging of the soldiers' horses, when about midway of the stream, the boat was damaged, the ferryman drowned, and the business of the ferry injured by the accident.

The apprenticeship of the ferryman was to expire in thirty-three months thereafter; and the memorialist claims the sum of $538, or at the rate of sixteen dollars per month, for loss of his services, and for damages to the boat and ferry $250; making a total of $788.

The committee state their belief that the officer in command of this squad of cavalry, and who was also drowned, was in the line of duty, and that he neither exceeded his authority nor acted indiscreetly in attempting to pass over his command in the manner represented. The accident was owing as much to the weakness and ill repair of the boat as to its being overloaded. Had the deck beams of the boat been sufficiently sound to withstand the stamping of the cavalry horses, it is reasonable to suppose the whole party would have gone over safely. As a common carrier, the memorialist is, therefore, as justly responsible for the accident as any party in the transaction. The committee are not of the opinion that the Government is either legally or equitably obliged to make good the loss of the possible services of the colored apprentice. The evidence supporting this extraordinary claim was not of such weight and distinctness as to convince the committee that there is the least merit in any portion of the claim, and therefore they recommended that the memorial and accompanying papers be laid on the table.

The memorial and accompanying papers were laid on the table.

AARON B. RYNO.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the petition of Aaron B. Ryno, of Gains, Genesee county, Michigan, for relief or remuneration for losses during the war; which was laid on the table.

MRS. MARY GEARY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the petition of Mrs. Mary Geary, claiming compensation for commissary supplies furnished to the United States Army; which was laid on the table.

JAMES W. BUTLER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the petition of James W. Butler, claiming compensation for services as a detective under L. C. Baker; which was laid on the table.

MRS. ELLEN CRAIG.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the petition of Mrs. Ellen Craig, claiming compensation for damages; which was laid on the table.

CAPTAIN A. F. ROCKWELL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the petition of Captain A. F. Rockwell, for change of date of muster; which was laid on the table.

JOHN G. COX.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the petition of John G. Cox, asking reimbursement for seventy-seven dollars sent by him through the mails and lost in course of transmission; which was laid on the table.

CLAIMS ON AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, reported back certain claims against the Department of Agriculture, accompanied with a bill (H. R. No. 1068) to provide for certain claims against the Department of Agriculture; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read in extenso, appropriates the sum of $47,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, from which shall be paid such indebtedness and claims against the Department of Agriculture contracted prior to the 1st of July, 1867, and included in the report of the Committee of Claims herewith, as shall be submitted to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, with sufficient evidence under oath as to the origin and validity of the same respectively, and decided by the Fifth Auditor and the final accounting officer of the Treasury to be due to the respective claimants according to the rules of law and equity.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Read the report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I will explain it. It will be recollected that this matter was first referred to the Committee on Appropriations. These are claims arising from the fact that the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture were exhausted, and accordingly when these bills were presented to that Department, after the death of the commissioner, there were no funds out of which they could be paid. The various bills were referred to the Committee of Claims. There are some fifty or seventy-five different bills, and it is utterly impossible, as the House will see, for that committee to examine into these different claims. So far as we can judge they appear to be fair and honest claims, ranging in amount from two or three dollars up to fifteen or eighteen thousand. So far as the management of the Agricultural Department is concerned, there seems to have been no reference to the different appropriations, but all purchases have been made and charged to the Agricultural Department account without reference to the appropriations for the specific purposes. What I mean is this: Congress appropriates one amount of money for the purchase of seeds, yet money is used for the purchase of seeds that is taken out of appropriations for other purposes, and money for the purchase of seeds is used for other purposes of that Department. As it is impossible for the committee to examine all of these claims, we have simply reported them all back, putting upon each claimant the necessity of going before the proper accounting officer and there subjecting each one to the same proof he would be subjected to before a court to substantiate the justice of his claim. If it be proved to the satisfaction of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury then it is provided each one of these claims shall be paid; and if not so proved, then these claims are not to be paid. We thought it was the best course we could take.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the following cases; and the same were laid on the table:

Petition of E. Kipp, of the city of Washington;

Petition of James Keenan;

Petition of Captain G. H. Bonebrake;

Petition of J. W. Martin; and Petition of Nancy Russell.

MICHAEL M'CANN.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the case of Michael McCann be recommitted, so as to correct an error.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWARD E. SHEAD.

Mr. STOKES, from the Committee of Claims, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 265) for the relief of Edward E. Shead, of Eastport, Maine; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to E. E. Shead, of Eastport, in the State of Maine, two six per cent. coupon bonds for the sum of $500 each, in lieu of two bonds destroyed by fire, bearing date August 18, 1864, numbered 19747 and 19748, payable in 1881.

It appears from the report that the sworn statement of the claimant and others shows that he was the owner of certain seven and three tenths United States securities, and placed them in the hands of E. H. Wadsworth, of Eastport, who employed Spencer, Vila & Co., of Boston, to convert them into six per cent. coupon bonds due in 1881. It further appears from the proof that they were sent about the 23d of June, 1864, and that he received in exchange three $500 six per cent. coupon bonds, numbered 17746, 19747, and 19748, bearing date 18th August, 1864. The same were delivered to E. H. Wadsworth, who delivered the last two to the claimant, who shut them up in his safe. They were there at ten o'clock p. m. on the 22d October, 1864; but at about one o'clock of the same night a fire broke out and destroyed the building in which the safe was kept. The proof is clear that after the fire ceased an examination was made by opening the safe, and the bonds were plain to be seen in their charred condition, and were distinctly recognized, but on handling them they fell to pieces.

Mr. PRICE. Where are the charred remains?

Mr. STOKES. I have the remains of a portion of them in my room at this time, which were handed to me by the gentleman from Maine. The case is as clear a one as can be made out. Mr. Shead was the owner of the bonds, and they were destroyed by fire.

Mr. ROSS. I would ask what evidence there is besides the statement of the applicant. There are a great many bonds in the country that have been burned lately. I understand from the report that the case rests mainly upon the evidence of the applicant. I would like the gentleman to inform the House whether there is complete and satisfactory evidence that these bonds were burned, and, if so, where that evidence is.

Mr. STOKES. I have already stated that we have the affidavit of Mr. Shead himself, of his clerk, and of Mr. Wadsworth. We have also the certificate of the firm of Spencer, Vila & Co., of Boston, who received from Mr. Shead, through the hands of Mr. Wadsworth, the seven-thirty notes, and converted them into the bonds which were destroyed.

Mr. PIKE. This case does not depend upon the affidavit or testimony of the claimant alone, but on the testimony of those who saw the bonds in the safe the night before at ten o'clock and those who saw them the next morning after the safe was opened. I know these parties. I have known them from my youth up. I know that those who testify in this case do so as honestly as any man in this House can testify. The fire that destroyed these bonds was one that not only consumed this store but the whole business part of the town. The reason why this safe was not rescued from the flames was because the claimant, Shead, was a member of a fire company, and was engaged in extinguishing the fire in another part of the town, not dreaming that it would reach his store. But the town was built of wood, a side-wind sprung up and blew over the quarter where this store was situated, and, unexpectedly to him and everybody else, consumed it. While he was protecting other peoples' property he failed to protect his own. It is as honest a case as ever was presented.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STOKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES N. GOLDING.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, Senate bill No. 251, for the relief of Captain Charles N. Golding, late quartermaster of volunteers, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

CHARLES B. TANNER.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1069) for the relief of Charles B. Tanner, late first lieutenant sixty-ninth Pennsylvania volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill appropriates $144 92, to be paid to the claimant as first lieutenant and aid-de-camp, to cover a period of service from November 8 to December 15, 1864, inclusive, at which time he actually performed duty and was regularly commissioned in the sixty-ninth regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, but was not mustered in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed unanimously.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILSON, of Ohio, Mr. HILL, and Mr. MILLER.

LAND GRANTS IN MICHIGAN AND WISCONSIN.

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. DRIGGS, who asked unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Public Lands the amendments of the Senate to joint resolution of the House No. 95, concerning certain lands granted to railroad companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin, with an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the amendments be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the joint resolution and amendments be read, reserving the right to object.

Mr. DRIGGS. Let me make a very brief explanation. This joint resolution passed the House by a very large majority, and went to the Senate. The Senate amended it. When it came back here I objected to the amendment; I wished to look into it a little closely, and it was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. The committee have examined it and have placed a restriction on the grant, and with that restriction they ask to have the amendment of the Senate concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the joint resolution and both the amendments be read.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. That a failure to grade twenty miles of the road within two years from the passage of the act entitled "An act to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads to which land grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin," approved on the 3d of March, 1865, and twenty miles additional thereof in each year thereafter, as required by said act, shall not cause any forfeiture or reversion to the United States of any lands granted to the said States, or either of them, to aid in the construction of the railroads described: Provided, That said companies, or either of them, shall fully complete their said railroads in the manner required by law on or before the 31st of December, A. D. 1872, at which time a failure shall forfeit the lands to the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a patent, in due form of law, to be issued to the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company, in pursuance of a resolution passed by Congress granting the same to the State of Wisconsin, approved April 25, A. D. 1862, and an act of the Legislature of Wisconsin approved June 16, A. D. 1862, granting the same to said company, for eighty acres of land of the Fort Howard military reserve, as the same was surveyed and approved by the said commissioner on the 11th of June, A. D. 1864.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

On page 2, after line one, insert:

Provided, The provisions of this section shall apply only to the chartered and projected line of railway from the city of Fond du Lac, in the State of Wisconsin, northerly to Escanaba, in the State of Michigan, and the chartered and projected line of railway from Marquette, in the State of Michigan, westerly to Ontonagon, in the same State.

The amendment to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands was then read, as follows:

And provided further, That if the said Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, in the State of Michigan, shall not have completed according to law ten additional miles of their railroad on or before the 1st day of January, 1869, and shall not in like manner complete ten miles of said railroad in each and every year thereafter, then it shall be lawful for the Legislature of the said State of Michigan to declare the grant of lands to said company to be forfeited and to confer the said grant of lands upon some other company in the same manner as if the said grant was now for the first time made to said State of Michigan.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve the right to object until the gentleman from Michigan has made his statement.

Mr. DRIGGS. As the joint resolution has passed the House, and the amendment of the committee is merely a restriction, I will ask for the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to object to the joint resolution unless the gentleman can give us some explanation of its effect. It is impossible to tell from the reading of the joint resolution and the amendments exactly what it provides. What is the effect of the joint resolution? Does it increase the land grant?

Mr. DRIGGS. It does not increase the grant at all. It is simply an extension of eighteen months on the time of the original grant, and provides for a perfect forfeiture at the end of the extended time if they fail to complete the road. I pledge my word to the gentleman that it makes no additional grant of lands; and that it places further restrictions on the company.

The clause in reference to the Fort Howard reserve simply authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent, under the law already passed, giving that land in the Fort Howard reserve for depot purposes to the railroad company. Does the gentleman want any further explanation?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand, then, that the effect of the joint resolution is simply to extend the time within which the road shall be completed.

Mr. DRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not increase the grant?

Mr. DRIGGS. There is no increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. How long is the time extended?

Mr. DRIGGS. Eighteen months. The grant does not expire until 1870, and this extends it to 1872. It is an extension of less than two years. I call the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will allow me to suggest an amendment.

Mr. DRIGGS. I cannot do that. The gentleman wants to make the company hold these lands in market, and that would embarrass it for so brief a time. I therefore cannot consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must say to the gentleman from Michigan that this matter was allowed to come up by my yielding the floor to him with a view to accommodate him if possible. I cannot allow the joint resolution to come before the House if there is any substantial objection to it. If the effect of the joint resolution is simply to extend the time, I certainly shall not raise any objection; but I must insist that the gentleman from Ohio shall be heard.

Mr. DRIGGS. Very well; I will hear him.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask that the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all lands which may be granted to said company to aid in the construction of said railway shall be sold by said company only to actual settlers, in quantities not greater than one quarter section to any one person, and at a price not exceeding $1 25 per acre; and the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect; and no person shall be deemed an actual settler who does not furnish evidence in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe that it is his or her intention to enter upon, improve, and reside upon the lands he or she may purchase as and for a homestead.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Public Lands be again read.

The amendment was read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I decidedly object to the last part of that amendment, and I do not think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] should insist upon it. It asks Congress to delegate our power to the State of Michigan to dispose of the public lands.

Mr. DRIGGS. I do not think my friend understands fully the bearing of that amendment. It has been customary to confer these grants of land upon the States for the benefit of roads. This extension would give the land to the company, and withdraw the control of the State of Michigan from the company, were it not for the very amendment to which the gentleman objects. It is this very restriction which gives the State authority over the land should the company fail. The committee thought that would certainly be satisfactory to the gentleman from Illinois, knowing his views upon the subject; so that the State may compel the building of this road by this company, or give the grant to some other company. As I suppose I may be regarded as having the management of this bill, I will call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe I reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the bill being considered?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the previous question being seconded, with the understanding that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] and the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] be voted upon.

Mr. DRIGGS. What amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to propose to amend by striking out the last clause of the amendment reported from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HOPKINS. Permit me to state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] would not, from the very nature of the case, be operative upon this bill, even if adopted. This bill does not propose to grant any lands; none at all. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio provides that all lands granted to this company by this bill, or which may be granted hereafter, shall be disposed of as provided by the amendment.

And allow me to state another reason why it will be impossible for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio to operate upon this bill. The principle of that amendment was considered by the Committee on the Public Lands. The lands now in the possession of these railroad companies are subject to land mortgages, and therefore it is impossible for this amendment to apply to them, and we cannot make it operative, even if we should adopt it.

I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman on general principles, and I assure the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that, in my opinion, no bill will hereafter be reported by the Committee on the Public Lands granting an acre of land for the construction of railroads without having incorporated in it a provision even more strongly guarded than this amendment. But I insist that this amendment should not be applied to this bill.

Let me say further, that this bill was fully discussed and thoroughly considered when it was up in the House at the time of its passage, and it was passed by a vote of three to one. In the Senate it was passed without any opposition at all. The amendment of the Senate has been thoroughly considered by the Committee on the Public Lands. At the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] we have recommended the putting a new restriction in the bill; and I can see no reason why any gentleman should oppose its passage in the form in which it now comes before the House.

Mr. DRIGGS. Before proceeding further, I would like to know just how this matter stands. I took the floor by the consent of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to report this bill, and it now would seem that I am not entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] that the Chair is not himself very certain who has the floor. The gentleman from Michigan asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to yield to him to report a bill from the Committee on the Public Lands. The gentleman from Indiana said he would do so, reserving to himself the right to object after the bill and proposed amendments had been read. When they had been read the gentleman from Indiana said he would still reserve his right to object until certain amendments proposed by members had been read. After those amendments had been read the gentleman said he would waive his objection if the amendments were submitted to a vote of the House.

The Chair thinks this has been a continuing right to object. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] should now resume his seat without making further objection the bill would be before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOPKINS.] He says my amendment cannot be made applicable to this railroad company, for the reason that the grant has already been made to them. In reply to that suggestion, I wish to say that this bill proposes to relieve this railroad company from a forfeiture of the lands which have been granted to the company. Now, sir, we can make it a condition of relieving this company from the forfeiture that the company shall be required to sell the lands upon any terms and at any price which we may prescribe.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me say to the gentleman right here that the lands have never been forfeited.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The object of this bill is to relieve the company from a forfeiture, and we can annex as a condition of that relief the requirement that the company shall sell these lands upon any terms we may prescribe.

Mr. HOPKINS. But it is not a question of forfeiture. These lands have never been forfeited.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The time has not expired; but it will expire before this company can complete the road; the forfeiture will occur in the future unless we pass this bill. The object of the bill is to relieve the company from the forfeiture. Now, sir, we can make it a condition of the relief that the company shall sell these lands at any price we prescribe. The gentleman says he is in favor of the general principle involved in the amendment I have submitted. If that be so, then I hope he will aid us in carrying this amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would do so if it were in our power to impose such a requirement; but it is not. This question was thoroughly considered in committee, and we decided that under the circumstances Congress has not the power to impose such a requirement.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. But, Mr. Speaker, I think I am showing that we can annex this as a condition upon which we will relieve the company from the forfeiture. I know, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DRIGGS. If I am entitled to the floor, I call the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to the floor, he having continued to claim his right to it. He has yielded to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DRIGGS. I hope that in fairness to me, if I am to have no voice in the control of this measure, I may be allowed to withdraw it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will make no objection to the consideration of this bill; but I hope that the previous question will not be sustained, and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] will be allowed an opportunity to submit his amendment. The soundness of the proposition as a general principle is not questioned.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will simply say that these lands are not agricultural lands, and will not be taken up for many years to come. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; there being—ayes 64, noes 34.

The main question was ordered, which was first upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands to the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES ROCK.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1070) for the relief of James Rock, of Saginaw, in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that there be appropriated for the payment of the traveling expenses of James Rock, late corporal of company C, seventh regiment Michigan volunteer cavalry, from Great Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, where he was mustered out of service on the 30th of November, 1865, to the place of his enrollment, a sum sufficient to allow him $325, deducting therefrom the amount, if any, paid to him for commutation of travel, pay, and subsistence by the Government when thus mustered out; and that the account be settled and paid under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is no written report I hope the gentleman from New York will state the facts.

Mr. WARD. There is a unanimous report, which I ask to be read.

The Clerk read the report. It appears that the petitioner on the 27th of February, 1864, was mustered into the United States military service as a private in the seventh Michigan cavalry for the term of three years or during the war; that on or about the 31st of October, 1865, the petitioner with other enlisted men and non-commissioned officers of said regiment were at Fort Bridger for the purpose of being consolidated with the first Michigan volunteer cavalry; that the consolidation took place according to the orders of the War Department in the month of November, 1865, at which time and place it was found the petitioner was the only man in excess of the proper quota necessary to fill up the regiment as consolidated to the maximum strength. The petitioner was thereupon ordered to Great Salt Lake City, and on the 30th of November following was mustered out of the service and compelled to return to his home at Saginaw, Michigan, at his own expense, and without being furnished with transportation. These facts are sufficiently proved by the papers from the War Department.

On the 8th of July, 1866, in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, it was provided by law that transportation should be furnished to the first Michigan cavalry from Utah Territory to the place of enlistment of said regiment, in the State of Michigan. The petitioner is entitled to have that provision of law extended to him, the benefit of which he has been deprived by the consolidation of the seventh with the first regiment of Michigan cavalry.

Mr. WARD. The report contains all the facts in the case, and the bill is presented by direction of the Committee of Claims unanimously. I trust there will be no objection to it. I apprehend there can be none. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the same committee, made adverse reports on the following cases; and the same were laid on the table:

Petition of Frederick J. Jones, praying appropriation for relief; and Petition of Amelia Ann Whittaker.

The SPEAKER stated that the morning hour had expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TABER, on account of sickness in his family, was granted leave of absence. Mr. STONE was also granted indefinite leave of absence.

GRANTS OF LANDS TO NEVADA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back Senate bill No. 190, further to provide for giving effect to the various grants of public lands to the State of Nevada, with amendments; which were ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

IDAHO LAND OFFICERS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 652 to increase the compensation of registers and receivers in the Territory of Idaho; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

UNDERVALUATION OF IMPORTATIONS.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1071) to further prevent undervaluation of merchandise imported into the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NEW YORK POST ROUTE.

Mr. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1072) to declare a post route from Lake View, Erie county, New York, by way of North Evans, Eden Valley, Eden, Collins, and Shirley; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ADMISSION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order was House bill No. 1058, to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. I yield ten minutes to my colleague.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, after the experiences of the past I have no hope that anything which can be said on this side of the House will affect legislation on the bill now under consideration. But it is due to the great interest which attaches to the matter from the constitutional and other general considerations which it involves, that we should follow up our opposition to the reconstruction acts by the most unqualified objection to the pending measure.

The bill now before us is the legitimate result of that legislation which has already taken place in regard to the reconstruction of the southern States. On adopting the views of the majority I ought, perhaps, to say in regard to certain territory recently acquired by a war of subjugation and conquest waged by the United States against several millions of its own citizens. The repugnance of a large portion of the Republican party and of its Representatives to the extreme doctrines promulgated in the Thirty-Eighth Congress by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] yielded to the strong radical opinions of their leaders, and, as has always been the case in all such struggles, the weakness of the timid and vacillating soon gave way before the arguments and demands of those of stronger nerves and bolder views. The whole party has thus for some years past moved together in regard to these measures, headed by those whose opinions were denounced and whose positions as leaders were contested in the days of President Lincoln, and one more of the measures "outside of the Constitution" is now before us.

The brief time for which I am entitled to the floor does not permit me to enter into any examination of the provisions of the several constitutions. Indeed, no sufficient time has been afforded to us for that purpose, as they were only laid on our tables yesterday. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] called the attention of the House yesterday to several most objectionable provisions which some of them contained, especially as to the compulsory education of whites and blacks together. But I must leave this part of the subject, and content myself with referring to some historical facts connected with the origin of the reconstruction measures.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is entitled to the credit, or must bear the odium of these measures according to the light in which they may be viewed.

But it is to be said to his honor that he has at all times boldly expressed his views, and maintained them with all the ability for which he is distinguished. He has admitted that these measures are outside of the Constitution, and he has brought his party friends up to his standard. In voting articles of impeachment against the President they seem quite to have overlooked their own disregard of the fundamental law of the Commonwealth, but this is very likely to happen with those who forsake the paths of political rectitude, and look forward only to party success and to party supremacy.

In the few minutes left to me I will call attention to a discussion which took place in the Thirty-Eighth Congress on what was called the confiscation bill, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] propounded views to the House which not only excited much attention here but produced a profound impression throughout the country. Those views were to a great extent entirely novel. They had been hinted at, they had been broached, but they never had been fully placed either before Congress or the country until the memorable debate of January, 1864, when the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania rose in his place and defined his position. In most of its aspects it was so entirely novel that it startled his own political friends. But although they then disavowed his views they afterward fully came up to them and have acted with him for more than two years past.

You, Mr. Speaker, (Mr. BROOMALL in the chair,) were here, and will recollect the interest excited by that debate. You may remember how members of the House, on both sides, clustered around the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the deep interest with which they listened to his remarks. His position was, that by the acts of our own Government in exchanging prisoners, but, above all, by the proclamation of blockade, which was intended as a measure on our part to aid in suppressing the rebellion, we had acknowledged that the southern States were belligerents, in the full sense of that word, under the law of nations, and henceforth the struggle was between two nationalities, and not a struggle on our part to suppress a rebellion. On that theory he based those views which have resulted in measures which now bring before us the constitutions of these southern provinces—for such they are, according to his theory—for our acceptance and approval, and for us to say whether these States, all of which, I believe, except one, were original members of the confederacy, shall be again recognized as States of the Union.

I need not remind you that that theory was received with marks of strong disapprobation by President Lincoln's Cabinet, for it was in fact a direct censure upon the President. It was a declaration that an act which he had approved had changed the struggle from an attempt to put down rebellion to a recognition of belligerent rights on the part of the rebel States. We all know how much that doctrine was controverted at the time and how strongly and earnestly it was denounced by gentlemen holding positions connected with the administration of President Lincoln. But, sir, the views were boldly carried out and we have the result now before us as far as it has been reached in this direction in the shape of these constitutions now presented for our approval.

I refer to these facts for their historical interest as showing the entire change of front which has taken place in the Republican party on this great vital point, and how the bold views and the bold manner in which they were urged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, have induced that party, all of its members here, I believe, without exception, to come over to his position and to act upon his principles.

At a subsequent stage of that debate I attempted, as well as my feeble ability would allow me, to show how entirely the gentleman from Pennsylvania misunderstood and misconstrued the proclamation of belligerency which was issued by President Lincoln. It was a proclamation which on its face declared the existence of the rebellion as a rebellion, and that was put forward as one of the measures for the suppression of that rebellion.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRUYN. Will my colleague allow me a moment or two longer?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRUYN. I referred then to the language of that proclamation, and especially to the concluding clause of it, which declared that any attempt on the part of any persons on the high seas claiming authority under this pretended confederation to disturb the commerce of the United States would be treated as piracy, for the purpose of showing that the construction put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on that proclamation was not one warranted either by its terms or by its meaning as derived from the face of the proclamation itself.

Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to say some things more upon this subject and others collaterally connected with it, but my time has expired, and I yield the floor to my colleague.

Messrs. BROOKS and PAINE addressed the House. [Their remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not my purpose to delay the House with this discussion. I desire to say in the outset that it does seem to me that the public interest requires the speedy restoration of the States lately in insurrection to political power in the Union. That is the general object of the bill, and in so far it has my entire approval. It is my purpose to support the bill, not because I am satisfied with all its details; I desire to amend it, not because I am satisfied with the provisions of these constitutions; I would wish to see them amended, but because, under the circumstances, it is the best that can be done for the public interest.

And I desire to say in this connection that it ill becomes gentlemen who represent what is called the Democratic party to be saying one word about the constitutions of these several States, for if there is any fact more clearly established in the history of the Republic than another it is the fact which has drenched this land in blood, that constitutions on the side of despotism, never to be repealed by the action of their people, even in the interest of the rights of a common humanity, received upon this floor the united vote of the Democratic party that come here to make this howl against free constitutions. Let gentlemen go back and read their records on the constitutions of the past and be silent, especially their record on the constitution of the State of Arkansas and the infamous Leecompton constitution. Let them go back and read their record upon the fugitive slave act of 1850 and be silent. Let them go back and read the resolution pronounced at Baltimore in 1852, wherein they undertook to dispose of the reserved rights of all the people of this country as a party organization and be silent. I have nothing but contempt for the pretenses of these apostles of constitutional liberty at this time of day, neither have the American people.

Mr. WOODWARD. It is reciprocated.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman says it is reciprocal. Reciprocity implies equality, and thank God it is not reciprocal; for there is no equality in the case.

Mr. WOODWARD. I said it was reciprocated.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, no matter. The constitutions of these several States, in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States as it stands amended by the act of the American people, secure equal political and civil rights and equal privileges to all citizens of the United States, native born and naturalized. Time was in this Republic when that was Democracy. If the utterance of Jefferson ever meant anything—and I think it signified a great deal—it meant precisely that when he declared for equal and exact justice to all men; equality of rights to all. This is all I desire to say on that subject.

I now desire to call the attention of the House very briefly to the amendment which I offered to the bill as reported by the committee, and it is to strike from the bill as reported these words:

That the constitutions of said States shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions respectively, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted.

One reason why I desire to strike that provision out is this, that these constitutions are in conflict with each other.

Mr. PAINE. I understood that the gentleman's amendment was to strike out those words and insert certain others.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly, and I am going to read what I propose to insert, but I desire first to explain what I want to strike out and why. My statement to the House is—and I desire the attention of the House to it—that this provision, as it stands reported by the committee, expressly declares that no person now authorized to vote by the several constitutions of the States named in this bill shall by any amendment to these constitutions ever be deprived of that right.

What I desire to say further in this connection is that that perpetuates the conditions of franchise in each of these constitutions precisely as they stand recorded this day, and those conditions of franchise in the several constitutions presented are in direct conflict with each other. They can hardly all be right, if right be involved in any conditions imposed by States upon the elective franchise. For example, the constitution of North Carolina, on page 49 of the report, requires thirty days' residence in the county in which the party shall offer to vote. The constitution of Louisiana, on the other hand, on page 29, requires ten days' residence in the parish. By your bill you declare that Louisiana shall not increase the term of residence to thirty days, and you declare just as well that North Carolina shall not increase the term to forty days. In other words, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, these constitutions are to be perpetual in this behalf; because, if North Carolina should change its constitution so that a party voting should be required to have a residence of forty days instead of thirty days, it would violate this fundamental condition; and if Louisiana should change its constitution so as to make it like that of North Carolina and require a residence of thirty days instead of ten days, it would violate this condition.

Now, who is there here who is ready to say that a State shall not be at liberty at its pleasure to make these changes, provided it does not discriminate?

One word further and I have done. In one of these cases the constitution provides that a mere declaration of intention shall entitle a party resident in the State for a period of twelve months, and in the county thirty days, to vote, while the other constitutions declare that there must be actual naturalization and citizenship. Are you going to say that the State which has thus provided shall not be permitted to so amend its constitution as to put it in harmony with nine tenths of the constitutions of the States of this Union, and say that the elective franchise, which is the final power of the Republic, shall only be exercised by citizens of the Republic? This amendment in spirit prohibits any such change in the constitution of the State, for the simple reason that the constitution itself secures to persons who have declared their intentions to become citizens the right to vote. Your prohibition is that they shall never so amend the constitution as to take the right to vote away from any person who is now invested with that power by the constitution as it now stands.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to what seems to me to be a misstatement by him of the provision of this bill; an unintentional misstatement, of course. The provision is not that the constitution shall never be amended so as to deprive any person of the right to vote, but so as to deprive any citizen of the right to vote who is now entitled to it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Admit that; it does not alter the force of my argument at all. It only shows the inconsistencies of this bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. A foreigner not naturalized is not a citizen.

Mr. BINGHAM. Agreed. But how does that answer my argument about the provisions requiring ten days' and thirty days' residence?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It does not.

Mr. BINGHAM. And also the provisions requiring six months' and one year's residence? One constitution declares that a person residing in the State one year, and in the election district thirty days, shall be entitled to vote; and according to this bill that provision is never to be changed. Another constitution prescribes only six months' residence in the State and ten days in the parish, and that is never to be changed. Why not?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Permit me to say to the gentleman that the bill does not provide that the constitution shall not be changed in that respect, but that it shall not be changed so as to deprive a person of the right to vote who is now entitled to vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; this is the provision of the bill:

That the constitution of said State shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions respectively.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is the provision of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. As the constitution of one of these States now provides, a man residing in the State for six months and in the parish for ten days is entitled to vote. But if the constitution is so changed as to require twelve months' residence in the State instead of six months, or thirty days in the parish instead of ten days, then he is deprived of the right to vote, and there is no escape from it.

Now, the object of this provision of the bill I believe to be good; that is, to prevent class legislation and discrimination against the poor; to prevent such amendments of the constitution as would put the elective franchise in the hands of a favored class, to the exclusion of the body of the people, especially to the exclusion of those lately in slavery. But that object I submit is secured by the amendment which I have offered. I move to strike out of the bill the following:

That the constitutions of said States shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions respectively, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted.

The remainder of the section I propose to leave in the bill, as follows:

And no person shall ever be held to service or labor as a punishment for crime in said States, except by public officers charged with the custody of convicts by the laws thereof.

That I do not touch. I move to substitute for the words stricken out the following:

That civil and political rights and privileges shall be forever equally secured in said States to all citizens of the United States resident therein, in so far as is now provided in said constitutions respectively.

That all citizens shall be forever equal, subject to like penalties for like crimes and no other. I leave to the people the right to amend their State constitutions, subject to the requirements of the Federal Constitution. The civil and political rights and privileges of citizens of the United States of like age, sex, and residence, shall be equally enjoyed; they shall be equally subject to the same disabilities and to no others.

I venture to say here to-day that the amendment I have offered corresponds with all the traditions of the Republic, and with that great Missouri provision which was enacted by Congress in 1819, under the lead of the first men of this Republic. That provision, gentlemen will remember, was a limitation imposed upon the State of Missouri in the very words of the Constitution itself, to wit: that its constitution never should be so construed, and never should be so enforced, as to deprive any citizen of the United States of the rights and privileges of a citizen of the United States within the limits of that State.

The fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution secures this power to the Congress of the United States. Your fundamental condition would not be worth the paper upon which it is printed but for the new grant of power which has come to Congress through the fourteenth article of the amendments, which enables the people in Congress assembled to enforce this condition. It ought to be enforced. I desire equality of right, equality of civil right, if you please, and of privilege, which is the word of the Constitution itself. And, sir, if the words "civil and political rights and privileges of citizens" do not embrace the elective franchise, it is a new discovery to the American people. They do embrace everything pertaining or belonging to the citizenship of this country. "Civil and political rights and privileges!" The word "privileges" is the original word of the Constitution. Some gentlemen have contended that the elective franchise is a right rather than a privilege. In order to accommodate their views—and perhaps they are right—I have used the words "civil and political rights and privileges." I propose to declare that the civil and political rights and privileges under these several constitutions shall be forever equally enjoyed by all citizens of the United States in so far as the same are now secured by said constitutions respectively—I have modified the printed text by inserting these words—in so far as the same are now secured by those several constitutions; thus leaving the people still the privilege of amending their constitutions, enlarging, if they choose, the liberties of the people, or removing restrictions, as the public exigencies may require and the public interest may demand.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now rise to close the debate.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What is the amendment?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. It is to strike out the word "Alabama;" and if the gentleman will permit me I will in a few words give my reasons for offering this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. How long does the gentleman wish to speak?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Not over two or three minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the amendment will be entertained, although it is not in the form of an amendment to either of the pending amendments.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, in the act passed at the last session for the government of the rebel States it was provided that any of those States, under certain conditions, might call a convention, which should have power to frame a constitution and civil government under the provisions of the act of Congress; that the constitution, when formed, should be submitted to the people of the State for their ratification, and that if the majority of the registered voters declared in favor of the constitution, and that constitution, when submitted to Congress, should be approved by it, the State should then be admitted to representation. In the State of Alabama a convention assembled in pursuance of the act of Congress, a constitution was framed, and was submitted to the people. A vote upon its ratification was taken, and a majority of the registered voters did not vote for that adoption of that constitution.

Now, sir, all just government is based upon the consent of the governed, and I do not deem it either morally or legally or constitutionally right for Congress now to impose upon the State of Alabama a constitution which under the law of Congress itself they rejected, as they had the right to do. Something must be done in addition to what has already been done before we can with propriety admit the State of Alabama. To admit her in the present posture of affairs and impose upon her people a constitution which they have not adopted would not be consistent with the principles of republican institutions, and would inflict a serious wrong upon the people of that State. I hope that so far as this bill applies to Alabama it will not meet the favor of the House; and hence I have offered my amendment.

Mr. RAUM. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will hear it.

Mr. RAUM. I move to add to the third section the following:

It is hereby made the duty of the President, within ten days after receiving official information of the ratification of said amendment by the Legislature of either of said States, to issue a proclamation announcing that fact.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I agree that that shall be considered as a part of the bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask for a few minutes to reply.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes; and as soon as he has concluded I intend to ask for the vote on striking out "Alabama." After that I shall submit what I have to say.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it was anticipated that a motion would be made to strike out "Alabama," perhaps on account of the discussion heretofore had on its admissibility and the objection of the House heretofore taken. Now I will say to the House and to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] that I deny the reconstruction acts of Congress required at the time Alabama voted that a majority of the registered voters of that State should cast their votes for that constitution before the State should be admitted. No such construction can be put upon that act of Congress. It provides that if Congress is satisfied that a majority of the people are in favor of it the State shall be admitted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Read it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It has been read here a hundred times, for aught I know.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman has it at hand let him read it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the law requires that a majority of the registered voters shall cast their votes for it, what does that other language mean: that if Congress shall be satisfied a majority of the voters are for it then the State shall be admitted?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Read it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am willing the gentleman shall read it if my time can be extended.

I wish also to call the attention of the House to the fact that a larger proportion of the registered voters of Alabama voted for that constitution than in any other one of these States.

Mr. HIGBY rose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot yield.

Mr. Speaker, even if the law is as is contended for by the gentleman from Vermont, does he deny the power of Congress to rescind or repeal that law, as we afterward passed a law which applied to the other State constitutions? I repeat that a larger proportion of the registered voters of Alabama voted for that constitution than voted in these other States for these other constitutions. What nonsense it is, then, when Alabama has polled over seventy thousand votes for her constitution and only one thousand against it, a larger proportion than any other, you shall deny her admission and admit the others? There is neither reason nor good sense in the distinction. I say it without any reflection on my friend from Vermont. He is always a reasonable and sensible gentleman. I apply it to his argument. Three times the Committee on Reconstruction have examined this matter, and three times they have reported in its favor.

Mr. PAINE. With the gentleman's permission, I will read that part of the law which applies to this point. It is to be found in section five. The first clause of the section authorizes the presidents of the conventions in certain cases to forward the constitutions to the President of the United States. The section then proceeds as follows:

"And if it shall, moreover, appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said Constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. One word further, Mr. Speaker. Congress has repeatedly admitted States upon petition. Here are seventy thousand voters of Alabama petitioning Congress to admit that State. Why apply an iron rule to Alabama you do not apply to any other State?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I fear I shall not have time. I must decline to yield further.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask leave to offer the following amendment:

In lines nine, ten, eleven, and twelve, section one, amend so it will read as follows:

That the constitutions of said States shall never be so amended or changed as to discriminate in favor of or against any citizen or class of citizens of the United States in the right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions respectively, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonious at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted; and no person shall ever be held to service or labor as a punishment for crime in said States, except by public officers charged with the custody of convicts by the laws thereof.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I decline to accept it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will accept it because it is the same thing that I am aiming at in my amendment. I accept it as a part of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment by accepting this.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now call the previous question, and wait till the vote is taken on striking out Alabama, because the result of that vote might modify my speech. I suppose I can then have the floor?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The previous question exhausts itself on that amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 74, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beck, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Coburn, Driggs, Eldridge, Ferry, Garfield, Getz, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Grover, Hawkins, Higby, Johnson, Julian, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, V. Lawrence, Loan, Kerr, Ketchum, Knott, McCormick, Morgan, Mungen, Marshall, Marvin, McGormick, Poland, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Phelps, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stewart, Stone, Taylor, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Woodbridge, and Woodward—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Corvode, Cullom, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Gravelly, Harding, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Mallory, McCarthy, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Morrill, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Platts, Ponsley, Price, Raum, Schenck, Seofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—74.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Blaine, Butler, Calk, Cary, Chandler, Churchill, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Isabel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jones, Ladin, Logan, Lynch, Maynard, McCullough, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Pomeroy, Selze, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Arman, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Wood—55.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was disagreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now move the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me a few moments?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will yield five minutes.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, the space of five minutes is very little time to say anything on this question. Therefore I shall confine myself simply to two or three reflections. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has assailed these constitutions on account of the provisions they contain. Sir, how long has it been a Democratic principle to assail a constitution on the ground that the people of the State have made it different from the judgment of members of Congress? One of his objections is that they contain confiscation provisions, and that in some way they create inequality in the distribution of the public wealth. Sir, what was the character of the former constitutions which these have superseded? Were the gentleman and his Democratic associates ever heard speaking against a constitution which confiscated not only the goods and chattels, but the bodies and souls of a majority of the people of South Carolina, which sold them, fathers, mothers, and children, to the highest bidder under the hammer of the auctioneer? Was that Democratic? Yet, if it was not, when did the Democratic party or a Democratic orator lift a voice against the enormity? Nay, when did they fail to have jails in every northern State under the fugitive slave law, which was the second gospel of the party—jails yawning for the flesh of the hunted fugitive when the bloodhounds were on his track in the swamps and marshes of the South and over the very hills of the State which the gentleman represents. And this whether they were black, mulatto, or white; for so long as the Democratic law made a slave of the mother, the children were confiscated slaves forever.

Mr. MUNGEN. Did General Washington ever sign such a bill as that?

Mr. BROMWELL. I never was with General Washington, and I cannot testify as to his acts.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. You never will be with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROMWELL. The next ground of complaint is that common schools are provided for in this constitution. That, of course, awakens a double measure of wrath in this Democratic orator. We are asked if the Czar of Russia allows his serfs to take charge of the Government. Who expects the Czar of Russia to put either serfs or nobles in control of any portion of the Government in that absolute despotism? Is it then, indeed, true that the Democratic party, under Andrew Johnson, is so completely assimilated to the despotism of Russia as to be in favor of a reproduction of the principles of Russia here? It is most likely so; for it is only yesterday they have been compelled to lay down the whip and the auctioneer's hammer, those Democratic scepters over the souls and blood of men, because when the slave power they defend was hunted to its last defense, the battlements of Vicksburg and Atlanta and Richmond went down amid dust and flame and fire beneath the stunning thunders of republican and loyal power.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to be heard all over this House, but what I say will be said in such a way that those who choose to be quiet can hear it.

Our friends on the other side have to-day pursued the tactics which partially, though not to the same extent, they have pursued in what they have been pleased to call arguments for the last eight or ten years. It is not arguing the question, but arguing the man. For ten years no man on that side of the House has risen and spoken on any important question but what if a person were to enter the gallery he would think that I was on trial—that "the gentleman from Pennsylvania" was on trial for some offense. Four fifths of the time, and I believe a little fraction more than that of the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to-day was consumed in attacks, if you choose to call it so, on "the gentleman from Pennsylvania"—not upon his measures or upon that which he may be advocating. And why? I call upon every high-minded man here to say whether that course of argument, so long and persistently pursued, is an honorable or a dishonorable course of argument.

Gentlemen need not flatter themselves by supposing that I take to myself their remarks as "flattering unctio to my soul," or suppose that they intend them for the purpose of exalting me. I say to my brethren, all of us being equal, that it is intended as a disgrace to them. It is intended, under the pretense of exalting me, to degrade all others. Does the gentleman believe—for such is his argument—that by appealing to the envy, the ambition, of gentlemen around me, he can excite them to action because I happen to be in a particular course? Does he suppose that this excessive and unnecessary and unjustified praise of one individual is so to excite the ambition, or rather the envy, of the rest of the House as to induce them to forget the arts, the low arts, of low cunning, of low arguments—not in a low gentleman, but in a gentleman who uses low slang?

Now, sir, I, once for all, the first time in the course of ten years, have alluded to this unfair, this offensive line of argument on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the House. Excuse me, therefore, if, when I have said this, I shall pass it over and pretermit three quarters of an hour of the same kind of what the gentleman from New York thought was argument—I have no doubt did not know but it was argument—in his exaltation of one individual and his depression of one hundred and forty.

Now, then, a single word as to the bill. We have for some months past been listening to the clamor of outside gentlemen, sometimes known as "Copperheads," transformed for the worse from Democrats into crawling things called "Copperheads;" we have heard from them for months and months past loud complaints because the Republican party refused to admit these rebel States to participation in this Hall and in Congress, and we have been told that in consequence of their being outside our acts were illegitimate, and would be so declared. So much so that, fearing this Government would fail, our most patriotic and radical head of the Government—for he was as radical as I was, the last time I talked with him, just before his speech of the 22d of February—I have not seen him since, and I take no reports about what he has been doing since that time—so much so that that radical friend of ours, obeying their clamor, and yielding to the popular wish, established eleven military governments in those outlying States. Congress, some time after, not exactly liking the kind of men he appointed to rule there, took upon itself to assert its prerogative, and passed the laws known as the reconstruction laws. It made use of certain military men in carrying those laws into execution. And we have heard to-day the most bitter denunciations against Congress for establishing military despotisms in these subjugated States. How consistent all that is I leave to others to judge; it does not require much argument.

But there is great complaint that negroes are to be allowed to take part in the Government of this country. And it is said that in adopting these constitutions there were riots in some places, and in other places there was stuffing of ballot-boxes. I regret that this voting did not take place before the testimony was taken, and published in the contested-election case of Dodge vs. Brooks; for that testimony showed precisely the same course of conduct in that district which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has declared took place in these States down South.

Mr. BROOKS. But in that case they turned me out of Congress; and now they propose to admit all these States. That is the difference.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. They turned the gentleman out because I suppose—I do not know, but I hope not—because he either did or did not head those mobs. They let these States in because the legal voters did not head the mobs; but they were headed by men who were afraid of negro rule.

The gentleman protests against these constitutions because black men were allowed to vote. Now, I advise the gentleman to become dramatized, to become the hero of a second play like that of Rip Van Winkle, which is now so well played by that admirable actor, Mr. Jefferson. Has the gentleman from New York been asleep for the last few years? Does he not know that when he went to sleep this country was a country of slavery and governed by a despotism? Let him now wake up; let him call his little dog "Schneider," [laughter,] or anything else that will enable him to recollect that he is still the same man. He will find no despotism; he will find no slavery; he will find no bondage within the broad limits of this fair land, which God made free, but which we made slave. God has again made this land free, through the agency of the infernal regions, by means of war and bloodshed. And I trust the Almighty Ruler of nations will never again permit this land to be made slave; or, in other words, that He never will permit the Democratic party to gain the ascendancy. For just so much as the Democratic party shall again gain the ascendancy, just so much will that same spirit of despotism run riot which has disgraced this nation for a century. That spirit is rank in the breast of every man of them; and should they ever again obtain power despotic institutions will again be reestablished over every man whom they call their inferior, and who would be made inferior to them if they could wield the lash upon his back.

I trust, therefore, the gentleman will find that we do mean that every man in this Republic, whether he be black or white or mixed, whether he come from the East or from the West, from the North or from the South, from the rising sun or from the setting sun, is as free and as much his own governor as the gentleman from New York or myself. And I am sure there is no one who is not as worthy so to be as either of us. Let it never again be heard in these Halls that we object to institutions because they allow beings, allow all beings with immortal souls in their bodies, to take part in the Government under which they are to serve, under which they are to live, under which they are to rear their children, and under which they are to die.

I therefore say at once that I have no apology to make for the admission that we intend that these men shall have the right to compete in intellect, in science, in religion, with the gentleman from New York and his constituents of the Five Points, with myself and the honest yeomanry who are my constituents, and with all the people of this nation. And let him who is the most worthy, who climbs the highest upon the ladder of merit, of science, of intellect, of morality—let him be the ruler, according to law, of all his sluggish neighbors, no matter what may be their color, no matter who they are, whether they be men of nobility or whether they be of common rank. Indulge no longer that vain idea that any man of sufficient age and intellect is to be excluded from the governing power of this country. Never again I trust—never again I believe—will that infamous day appear for which the gentleman from New York so ardently prays.

Now, sir, what is the particular question we are considering? Five or six States have had submitted to them the question of forming constitutions for their own government. They have voluntarily formed such constitutions, under the direction of the Government of the United States. They have sent those constitutions here, backed, in every instance, even in that of Alabama, by a majority of all the voters within the State. And when I say "all the voters" I mean all the voters, black and white, whether they come from New York or South Carolina or elsewhere. They have sent us their constitutions. Those constitutions have been printed and laid before us. We have looked at them; we have pronounced them republican in form; and all we propose to require is that they shall remain so forever. Subject to this requirement, we are willing to admit them into the Union.

I know that by delaying thus far the admission of these States a great object has been gained. Some gentlemen on the other side were fearful that some of the Senators from those States would be admitted before we had ousted the first military despot of that region. There is not much danger now; and those gentlemen might afford to let these States come in. They know, I suppose, whether that gentleman is to remain longer in the White House; I do not. But, at any rate, we can admit no Senators in time to operate upon that question.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has moved an amendment against which I most earnestly protest. He proposes, against the recommendation of the committee, to leave each of these States free after its admission to amend the provisions with reference to the elective franchise, as it may deem proper, with regard to its own citizens. All of those States have now adopted the principle of universal suffrage. This country has adopted that principle so far as it has spoken of late. What we desire is to secure in these States the maintenance of this principle which they have adopted, so that every person of requisite age within those States shall be entitled to vote. The very amendment which the gentleman from Ohio proposes is what the protestants from South Carolina, who appeared before us, asked should be inserted in the bill. And they did not hesitate to give as their reason that if they should be allowed to amend their constitution in this respect, after the State had been admitted they could adopt a property qualification which would exclude from the elective franchise all the poor men; and when I asked them distinctly whether such a provision would not be intended to reach the negroes they had too much manliness to deny it. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio should be adopted, they could adopt a property qualification, applicable to all classes alike, which would reach down to just about the black line, depriving the negroes of the privilege of voting and again subjecting them to oppression. It would not be long before, by means of vagrant laws and other laws of similar character, the colored race would be again reduced to bondage even worse than the patriarchal.

The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio would be taken advantage of to inflict wrong upon the colored race, just as the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery has been evaded by taking advantage of the clause, "except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." In Florida, as I learn from two gentlemen connected with the Freedmen's Bureau, a law has been enacted providing that persons convicted of assault and battery may be sold for twenty years into bondage. If a white man runs against a negro on the pavement it is called an assault and battery, and the white man takes the negro into the court-house and in fifteen minutes has him convicted and sentenced to bondage for twenty years. These two gentlemen told me that they had witnessed the sentence of six negroes under just such circumstances. The negroes were sold into slavery for twenty years because white men had jostled them, or, as was said there, they had jostled white men. So if we leave the door open these colored people may all be made slaves again. I do not propose to leave any such door open.

As to the proposition to let the States make the time of residence required of voters a month longer or a month shorter, that is a matter of no particular importance. What is it if men are required to wait nine months before voting, when in my own State a much longer residence is required?

Mr. Speaker, I desire the vote to be taken before gentlemen become weary, and I will not occupy further time. I ask that the vote may be taken.

The question recurred first on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, as follows:

Add to the end of the first section as follows: That so much of the seventeenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of the State of Georgia as gives authority to the Legislature or courts to repudiate debts contracted prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, and similar provisions in the other constitutions mentioned in this bill, shall be null and void as against all men who were loyal during the whole time of the rebellion, and who, during that time, supported the Union, and they shall have the same rights in the courts and elsewhere as if no rebellion had existed.

Mr. KERR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 50, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Fields, Gravelly, Harding, Higby, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koonz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Miller, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Shanks, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Wyck, Ward, Welker, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Woodward—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Cullom, Elia, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Ingersoll, Johnson, Judd, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Laffin, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, McCormick, Moore, Morgan, Munger, Niblack, Nicholson, Paine, Pike, Prunty, Randall, Ross, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Aaron F. Stevens, Taylor, Van Auker, Bart Van Horn, Van Trump, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, and William B. Washburn—50.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Blaine, Brooks, Burr, Butler, Cate, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Finney, Fox, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jenckes, Jones, Lynch, Marshall, Maynard, McCullough, Mercier, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Robinson, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Wood—61.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question next recurred on Mr. BING-

HAM's amendment as modified by Mr. BENJAMIN, as follows:

Strike out the following:

That the constitutions of said States shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions respectively, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted; and no person shall ever be held to service or labor as a punishment for crime in said States, except by public officers charged with the custody of convicts by the laws thereof.

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

That the constitutions of said States shall never be amended or changed so as to discriminate in favor of or against any citizen or class of citizens of the United States in the right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions respectively, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted; and no person shall ever be held to service or labor as a punishment for crime in said States, except by public officers charged with the custody of convicts by the laws thereof.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 57, nays 46.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question next recurred on Mr. Brooks's amendment, to add the following:

And be it further enacted, That on and after the passage of this act all citizens of the United States in the States heretofore named shall be entitled to equal rights of suffrage.

Mr. JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, called for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 35, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cate, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Elia, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Harding, Higby, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Shanks, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Bart Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, Loan, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Munger, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Prunty, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Van Auker, Van Trump, Thomas Williams, and Woodward—35.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Blaine, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Finney, Fox, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Koonz, Lynch, Maynard, McCullough, Mercier, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Poland, Pomeroy, Selye, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—45.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ROBINSON stated that his colleague [Mr. TABER] had been compelled to leave on account of sickness, but wished it understood that he would have voted "no" had he been present.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, made the special order for Saturday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence after to-morrow was granted to Mr. ECKLEY.

EXPENSES OF LEGAL SERVICES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 11th of February, statements of amounts paid during each year since 1860 for legal services, &c.; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask consent to report back from the joint Committee on Retrenchment a bill (H. R. No. 948) to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof. I wish to submit some remarks to the House in favor of the bill with the understanding that no action shall be taken except to postpone its further consideration to the 3d day of June next after the morning hour.

No objection was made.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to say that perhaps the minority of the committee desire to make a report. I mention it now so that it may be understood that we reserve that right.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask that the bill may be printed in the Globe.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BENTON. I desire to state that I understood there was a division in the committee on this bill, and I received notice to attend a meeting of the committee to-morrow.

Mr. JENCKES. I call for no action this afternoon.

Mr. BENTON. I desire to make a motion to recommit, so as to give an opportunity for reexamination in the committee.

Mr. JENCKES. I will make that motion at the close of my remarks.

Mr. BENTON. Very well.

Mr. JENCKES, from the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, then reported a bill to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be created a new department of the Government of the United States, to be called the department of the civil service; that the head of said department shall be the Vice President of the United States, or in case of a vacancy in said office, the President of the Senate for the time being, who shall be a member and president of the board of commissioners hereinafter created, and shall perform all the duties pertaining thereto.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter all appointments of civil officers in the several Departments of the service of the United States, except postmasters and such officers as are or may be by law required to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made from those persons who shall have been found best qualified for the performance of the duties of the offices to which such appointments are to be made, in open and competitive examinations, to be conducted as herein prescribed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a board of four commissioners, who shall hold their offices for the term of five years, to be called the civil service examination board, among whose duties shall be the following:

First. To prescribe the qualifications requisite for an appointment into each branch and grade of the civil service of the United States, having regard to the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter.

Second. To provide for the examinations and periods and conditions of probation of all persons eligible under this act who may present themselves for admission into the civil service.

Third. To establish rules governing the applications of such persons, the times and places of their examinations, the subjects upon which such examinations shall be had, with other incidents thereof, and the mode of conducting the same, and the manner of keeping and preserving the records thereof, and of perpetuating the evidence of such applications, qualifications, examinations, probations, and their result, as they shall think expedient. Such rules shall be so framed as to keep the branches of the civil service and the different grades of each branch, as also the records applicable to each branch, distinct and separate. The said board shall divide the country into territorial districts for the purpose of holding examinations of applicants resident therein and others, and shall designate some convenient and accessible place in each district where examinations shall be held.

Fourth. To examine personally, or by persons by them specially designated, the applicants for appointment into the civil service of the United States.

Fifth. To make report of all rules and regulations established by them, and of a summary of their proceedings, including an abstract of their examinations for the different branches of the service, annually, to Congress at the opening of each session.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all appointments to the civil service provided for in this act shall be made from those who have passed the required examinations and probations in the following order and manner:

First. The applicant who stands highest in order of merit on the list of those who have passed the examination and probation for any particular branch and grade of the civil service shall have the preference in appointment to that branch and grade, and so on, in the order of precedence in examinations and merit during probation to the minimum degree of merit fixed by the board for such grade.

Second. Whenever any vacancy shall occur in any grade of the civil service above the lowest, in any branch, the senior in the next lower grade may be appointed to fill the same, or a new examination for that particular vacancy may be ordered, under the direction of the department, of those in the next lower grade, and the person found best qualified shall be entitled to the appointment to fill such vacancy: Provided, That no person now in office shall be promoted or transferred from a lower to a higher grade unless he shall have passed at least one examination under this act.

Third. The right of seniority shall be determined by the rank of merit assigned by the board upon the examinations, having regard also to seniority in service; but it shall at all times be in the power of the heads of Departments to order new examinations, which shall be conducted by the board, upon due notice, and according to fixed rules, and which shall determine seniority with regard to the persons ordered to be examined, or in the particular branch and grade of the service to which such examinations shall apply.

Fourth. Said board shall have power to establish rules for such special examinations, and also rules by which any persons exhibiting particular merit in any branch of the civil service may be advanced one or more points in their respective grades; and one-fourth of the promotions may be made on account of merit, irrespective of seniority in service, such merit to be ascertained by special examinations, or by advancement for meritorious services and special fitness for the particular branch of service, according to rules to be established as aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That said board shall also have power to prescribe a fee, not exceeding five dollars, to be paid by each applicant for examination, and also a fee not exceeding ten dollars, to be paid by each person who shall receive a certificate of recommendation for appointment or for promotion, or of seniority, which fees shall be first paid to the collector of internal revenue in the district where the applicant or officer resides or may be examined, to be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States by such collector; and the certificates of payment of fees to collectors shall be forwarded quarterly by the commissioners to the Treasury Department.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That said board shall have power to prescribe, by general rules, what misconduct or inefficiency shall be sufficient for the removal or suspension of all officers who come within the provisions of this act, and also to establish rules for the manner of preferring charges for such misconduct or inefficiency, and for the trial of the accused, and for determining his position pending such trial.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That any one of said commissioners may conduct or superintend any examinations, and the board may call to their assistance in such examinations such men of learning and high character as they may think fit, or, in their discretion, such officers in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, as may be designated from time to time, on application of the board, as assistants to said board, by the President or heads of Departments; and in special cases, to be fixed by rules or by resolutions of the board, they may delegate examinations to such persons, to be attended and presided over by one member of said board, or by some person specially designated to preside.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said board may also, upon reasonable notice to the person accused, hear and determine any case of alleged misconduct or inefficiency, under the general rules herein provided for, and in such case shall report to the head of the proper Department their finding in the matter, and may recommend the suspension or dismissal from office of any person found guilty of such misconduct or inefficiency; and such person shall be forthwith suspended or dismissed by the head of such Department pursuant to such recommendation, and from the filing of such report shall receive no compensation for official service except from and after the expiration of any term of suspension recommended by such report.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the salary of each of said commissioners, and the additional salary of the Vice President for performing the duties required of him by this act shall be $5,000 a year, and the said board may appoint a clerk at a salary of $2,500 a year, and a messenger at a salary of $900 a year, and these sums and the necessary traveling expenses of the commissioners, clerk, and messenger to be accounted for in detail and verified by affidavit, shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The necessary expenses of any person employed by said commissioners, as assistants, to be accounted for and verified in like manner, and certified by the board, shall also be paid in like manner.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That any officer in the civil service of the United States, at the date of the passage of this act, other than those excepted in the second section of this act, may be required by the head of the Department in which he serves to appear before said board, and if found not qualified for the place he occupies he shall be reported for dismissal, and be dismissed in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the vacancy shall be filled in manner aforesaid from those who may be found qualified for such grade of office after such examination.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all citizens of the United States shall be eligible to examination and appointment under the provisions of this act, and the heads of the several Departments may, in their discretion, designate the offices in the several branches of the civil service the duties of which may be performed by females as well as males, and for all such offices females as well as males shall be eligible, and may make application therefor and be examined, recommended, appointed, tried, suspended, and dismissed in manner aforesaid; and the names of those recommended by the examiners shall be placed upon the lists for appointment and promotion in the order of their merit and seniority, and without distinction, other than as aforesaid, from those of male applicants or officers.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the President, and also the Senate, may require any person applying for or recommended for any office which requires confirmation by the Senate to appear before said board and be examined as to his qualifications, either before or after being commissioned; and the result of such examination shall be reported to the President and to the Senate.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That until the confirmation by the Senate of the commissioners authorized to be appointed by this act, the head of said Department is hereby authorized to appoint persons to perform the duties of commissioners temporarily, with the same powers and at the same rate of compensation as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. JENCKES. The proposition submitted to the House by the bill now reported is, in effect, that the Government shall adopt better means than it now uses for obtaining the services, in its subordinate offices, of the best talent it can obtain for the money it pays. The number of persons now employed by the Government in its civil service as officers exceeds not only the whole number of officers in the military and naval service, but also the total of the rank and file of both the warlike services. To these persons is intrusted the entire administrative business of the Government; they are the eyes and the hands of every branch of the service; they constitute the whole clerical force of the executive and administrative departments, the agencies through which the public lands are disposed of and the Indian affairs are managed; the commercial intercourse with foreign nations regulated; the execution of the postal system conducted. They control the issuing of pensions, patents, and land warrants; the examination and allowance or rejection of all accounts or claims against the Government; the collection and disbursement of all the revenues and public moneys. There are responsible heads to all these Departments, and chiefs of bureaus and of divisions responsible to the heads of Departments; but the work is done by the "interior officers," and the responsible heads and chiefs seldom do more than adopt the acts and ratify the examinations and conclusions of their subordinates.

SCOPE OF THE MEASURE.

When we consider the great number of these officers, the magnitude of the affairs intrusted to their care, the importance of the faithful performance of their duties, and become aware that the life of the Republic depends upon the honesty, fidelity, integrity, and ability with which these servants of the people transact their business, we at once inquire why is it that some system has not been devised and put in operation by which the people can obtain the best talent in their service for the money appropriated for it? These administrative offices are the nervous system of the Republic, and through them its vital energies must be made known. Every one who has studied the political history of this country and of that from which its laws and customs have been derived can furnish his own answer to the question just stated. However each answer might be phrased, they would all concur in the great fact, that for the money it pays there is no Government in the world more poorly served than ours. Without elaborating the matter, the evidence taken by the committee proves, what every one believes, that these subordinate officers are appointed in the main from political or personal considerations, to which the qualifications of merit, integrity, skill, fidelity, and patriotism are compelled to yield. If any one were to undertake to devise a system by which the greatest amount of inexperience and incompetency should be brought into the public service, he could not invent one which would supersede the present in that bad eminence.

SUCCESS IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

This subject attracted the attention of thoughtful men long before it was acted upon in any of the western civilized nations. Boswell, in his life of Johnson, records the following conversation a hundred years ago:

"Sir Alexander [Macdonald] observed that the chancellors in England are chosen from views much inferior to the office, being chosen from temporary political views.

"Johnson. Why, sir, in such a Government as ours no man is appointed to an office because he is the fittest for it; nor hardly in any other Government, because there are so many connections and dependencies to be studied. A despotic Power may choose a man to an office merely because he is the fittest for it. The king of Prussia may do it."

This result has been achieved not only in Prussia, but, so far as regards the minor offices, in England also; and the success in these Governments is so great and so beneficial as to encourage the attempt to obtain the same end in our own. The science of government is progressive; and statesmen should not overlook the fact that great discoveries have been made in the laws that govern nations, as well as in those of nature, and that improvement and development are common to both.

LEADING FEATURES OF THE BILL.

As the evil which the bill now reported is designed to remove is of such great magnitude, so the remedy for it is thoroughly radical, in the best sense of that word. It does away with all personal influence; bribery of all kinds, either by personal recommendation or political reward, becomes impossible. It destroys all political or personal patronage. Zeal in pushing the claims of a friendly politician is not admitted to be evidence of fitness for an appraiser's place in a custom-house. Activity at primary meetings or in party conventions is not to be considered conclusive evidence of fitness for handling the people's money. Skill in using money at elections is not to be deemed the best proof of capacity for collecting the revenues. Vigilance in canvassing registration or alertness in challenging voters at the polls will not weigh much in favor of an applicant for a clerkship in the Pension Bureau or in the Quartermaster General's department. In short, the bill proposes a means of discovering the absolute fitness of the person desiring to enter the public service for the particular branch of the service to which he wishes to devote himself.

The bill does not exclude or interfere with the constitutional power of the heads of Departments to make appointments to their subordinate offices. It limits that power to selections from a class of persons whose fitness for such employment shall be decisively ascertained. In the Army and Navy such questioning is had, not only at the outset, but at each stage of the novitiate's career; and the beneficial result is shown in the great names that have illustrated each branch of the warlike service. But what renown has ever blazoned the name of any person who has entered and continued in the subordinate civil service of the Government? Vital as the efficiency of that service is to the conduct of the Government, who seeks employment in it from motives of patriotism, who enters upon it as a career, who, when once engaged in it, feels that his place is as sure as his merit?

PRESENT VICIOUS MODE OF APPOINTMENT.

I might multiply these questions, to which none but disheartening answers could be given. To make the subject more clear take a single custom-house as an example. Each considerable custom-house has three officers of presidential appointment, the collector, the naval officer, and the surveyor. Each of these must receive confirmation from the Senate. We will admit that none but competent persons can pass that ordeal. But in the great majority of cases the men who receive these appointments have not received the education, and have not had the experience to qualify them for the performance of the duties of their offices. But suppose them to be capable of learning and to have learned the duties of their offices, for the performance of all these duties they are entirely dependent upon their subordinates; and each and all of them are, under the law, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the collector of the port. It may be assumed that both the Secretary and the collector are politicians, and prefer to have their political friends in office; and that under the custom that has prevailed since President Jackson's time, they will strain some points in favor of their friends. The result is that the collector is an autocrat, so far as concerns the appointment of all his subordinates. A very pleasant thing for the partisans of an Administration in power; but how does the Government fare under such a system? How are the revenues collected by which the more direct taxes upon the people are lightened? Let us see.

ITS EVILS ILLUSTRATED.

In the theory of the revenue laws every ship entering any one of our ports is, with her cargo, in the custody of the revenue officers until the duties upon all dutiable goods in her cargo are paid or secured according to law. The surveyor of the port and his subordinates first take possession of the ship and cargo and hold possession or supervision of them till the duties are paid or the goods are deposited in the bonded warehouses. All the dutiable goods that enter the ports of the United States are for at least twenty-four hours in the charge of these subordinates of the surveyors of the customs. And the evidence which the committee has taken shows that these subordinates are the creatures of the collector, almost uniformly politicians of the lowest grade, appointed to these posts of inspectors and night watchmen for their political services at ward or primary meetings, and too often from their relationship to prominent politicians, and that, with here and there a rare exception, they have no peculiar fitness for the duties they undertake or skill in the performance of them. They are liable to be removed and persons wholly inexperienced appointed in their places at any moment. So prevalent has been the propensity to make changes within the last two years that some surveyors testify that they do not know at the close of one day what men their force will be composed of for the performance of their duties on the next. During every night, in every port and at every wharf in the United States, every cargo of dutiable goods is, theoretically, in the charge of these inspectors and night watchmen. Imagine a steamship with a cargo which ought to pay a million in duties lying at a wharf patrolled by one of these inspectors just appointed for his meritorious services in some local election where money had been freely used to control votes; or a fraudulent invoice submitted to the scrutiny of a clerk who had obtained his office as a reward for his skill in disposing of the same corruption fund. Why should smuggling be resorted to at out-of-the-way places when it can be accomplished at little risk or cost by some gentle persuasion upon these vigilant servants of the country? Now and then the really vigilant revenue officers make a seizure of some smuggler's goods among the bays and inlets of the intricate sea-coast of Maine, or along the northern frontier, or the vast coast line of the Gulf; but in the great ports a steamer's cargo can be run through in safety; not the entire cargo of any one ship, but enough of the cargoes of all the steamships in port to make the cargo for one. It was testified before the committee that on two occasions of inspection less than half of the inspectors and watchmen on the Hudson river side of New York were at their posts, and that when roundsmen were appointed to look more closely after these delinquents, one was waylaid and mortally beaten after he had made reports of their absence from their stations, and another by a similar assault was made a cripple for life.

HOW THE GREAT FRAUDS ARE ACCOMPLISHED.

The bold operator in contraband goods chargeable with high duties does not use the low schooner, or many oared boat of the traditional smuggler, but sails or steams boldly into the large ports, and watches for or buys his opportunity for landing them. When the slave trade was profitable the slavers were fitted out in the port of New York. The great highway robbers of the present day do not waylay travelers on barren heaths or along lonely highways as in the olden time, but they pounce upon their game amid the crowds that throng Wall street, or at the bank counters and in brokers' offices in that neighborhood, where people, with money in their hands or pockets, are constantly going and coming. The whisky excise is not materially diminished by the product of small stills in unfrequented places, in the swamps or among mountains, but the great illicit distilleries are found intrenched in the compact portions of large cities, and they have recently been found so strongly fortified in some places in and near the city of New York, and so well defended, that they have had to be taken by assault. So, the great frauds and thefts upon the customs' revenue are accomplished in the great ports; and now that the importation of certain articles which are charged with high duties has fallen almost altogether into the hands of foreigners, who never intend to become citizens of the United States, and who owe no allegiance to and have no respect for our Government, but consider it a legitimate object of plunder, the wonder is that we collect as much revenue as we do on that class of articles. The ingenuity of this class of smugglers almost surpasses belief; but the great fact of the existence of this smuggling, which causes a loss of millions annually to the Government, is fully proved. And the evidence warrants my saying that this great amount of smuggling could not be accomplished without connivance on the part of some of the officers of the Government.

EVIL EFFECT OF THIS SYSTEM ON EMPLOYÉS.

The report will show some of the curiosities of the business. We do not seek to disguise the cause of the inefficiency (to use the mildest term) of these officers. They are all appointed upon political or personal grounds, and as their tenure of office is insecure, and they may be removed at any time without previous notice and without cause, they do the least they can to earn their salaries. To use a favorite phrase with them, they "make the most of their time." Indeed, if any one should prove faithful and vigilant, and not only see that persons dealing with the Government act fairly, but also report any delinquencies of their fellows, their tenure of office would be more insecure, and any reputation of such fidelity to the Government would be the occasion of their removal. One of the worst, if not the very worst, feature in the present condition of the service is that good and faithful officers are unwilling to testify as to what they know of the "irregularities" (to use the fashionably mild term) of their associates. For there are many good and faithful servants who do the work of these unfaithful politicians. Men of character, of families, of long service, who have been unwilling to have their names go upon the record as witnesses to the faults of their associates, lest they should be immediately dismissed by their superiors, or lest their places should be made so uncomfortable by their "irregular" associates, that they would be compelled to resign. Nothing has impressed me more with the rottenness and corruption of our present want of system than the tears of these old and faithful servants, who begged that they might not be placed upon the record as witnesses to the faithlessness of their associates, and that it might not even be known that they had been called to be witnesses. Nothing but the assurance of secrecy and the protection given by law to persons giving such testimony, could procure us evidence of how the people were being plundered instead of being served.

The testimony with regard to the inefficiency of the internal revenue service comes from so many other sources that it is not necessary to state the substance of the evidence taken by this committee. The report collates it into a clear result.

NO ENCOURAGEMENT FOR FIDELITY.

Under the present practice all of these inferior officers, many thousands in number, are appointed by some superior officer, and their tenure of office, as well as their appointment, depends entirely on his will and pleasure. With few exceptions all these officers are well paid for the services they render, but with rare exceptions they do not render the services of which they are capable. One report says of these politicians who are quartered upon our customs that they consider the custom-houses as "eleemosynary institutions where the faithful can be at rest." Another speaks of a clerk in one of the Departments, (appointed upon the urgent solicitation of a member of Congress,) who was reminded from day to day that his work was not an equivalent for his salary. "Work," said he; "I worked to get here; you surely do not expect me to work any longer." All speak of the inefficiency of persons so nominated. And all of this vast army of persons in the civil service, more than twenty thousand, excluding postmasters, live and perform the semblance of working, under that anomaly, that great solecism in our republican institutions, that curse upon him that gives and him that partakes, partisan patronage. It works not only a blight upon those who become bound by its toils, but it repels the ingenious youth, who would, if the field were open, gladly compete for places in the public service. A person who gains a place under this practice has no inducement to excel in the performance of his duties. His place may be taken to-morrow for some more powerfully-backed competitor; nay, his very excellence may be a reason why his less industrious companions should urge his removal. But all, the excellent—and there are many of them—the incompetent, the lazy, the vicious, the unworthy—for such are to be found in the service—all work or pretend to work under the blighting influence of favor and patronage. To those who in arms serve the Republic a glorious career and great rewards are open; they serve in the eyes of their superiors and of the nation, and when success crowns their skill and daring, some ray of glory falls upon their swords and some reward or the sure promise of it makes lightsome their arduous services. Their exploits are the theme of the orator's eloquence, and their names the people delight to honor. But to the poor drudge in the civil service there never comes one ray of hope; glory and honor are never named to him; fame and fortune do not lure him to his daily toil; and he is not even sure of the daily toil which will bring to him and his family daily bread. He is but a hanger-on upon fortune and favor; no career is open to him; no incentive to noble or even faithful action. He may at any moment be disgraced without cause, and with the highest merit be turned adrift to starve. No service that he can perform is distinguished by public notice; no report ever gives his name to be honored by his countrymen; his lifetime is a dreary routine of drudgery; his career unknown to fame, his death unnoticed. How, then, can we expect virtue and fidelity among our civil servants? We may well apply the indignant query of the Roman satirist:

What hope of faithful service if it is to be without honor or reward?

It is not to be denied that this disease has penetrated every part of our political system. Unless it is thoroughly eradicated it must end in political death. This Government cannot be carried on so long as those who receive the people's money are studying how little they can render for what they receive, instead of giving the most they are capable of to the people's service. And it is doubtful whether this Government can endure many changes of administration when fifty thousand persons, more than the entire personnel of the Army and Navy, are liable to be dismissed from the public service for mere opinion's sake. Such shocks are like the repeated explosions of ordnance, which must, sooner or later, end in the disruption of the firmest metal.

NECESSITY FOR MAKING THE CIVIL SERVICE RESPECTABLE.

Every law requiring service originates in some necessity of the Government, and it must be so framed as to provide sufficient motive power for its execution. No such energizing element is infused into any of our statutes governing the civil service. Not even the quality of respectability is bestowed upon our civil servants. A certain degree of suspicion, of distrust, of depreciation, even though it be born of prejudice, is suffered to remain over all of them. There is not sufficient requirement of discipline, or encouragement of emulation, to create an esprit de corps, in any department of this service. Indeed, it would seem that by a system of studied depreciation of each other, the officers of each branch and grade of the civil service were striving to cultivate their own dishonor. They congregate or separate according to their partisan affinities; and cultivate no patriotic feeling in common as servants of the Republic. Social standing and consideration by reason of such employment is not thought of by any one of them. The Administration is always saying, in effect, to each of its civil servants, "Your skill, your experience, your long and faithful service are as nothing to us; we can discharge you to-morrow, and at once find a hundred others who will answer our purposes as well." Each one thus suffers a standing discredit. His place is due to accident, and gives him no title to respect. It implies, rather, a damaged reputation and a character that can be tampered with. A tide-waiter can be nothing more, nor is he sure of even being that, although he proves to be the most faithful and capable of tide-waiters. If he does not bury his talent himself, it is buried for him, and his possible skill in making usance by it can avail him nothing. No grades, no promotions, no hopes, no honors, no rewards, are open to the most faithful, diligent and honest officer, and while the incentive to excellence in service which these might give is wholly lost, his office itself gives him no character or social position. But if by merit and fidelity the tide-waiter can win the higher places in the customs, his place, himself, and the service itself, acquire respectability. The cadet of either of the warlike services has a prestige in this regard over even the higher grades of the civil service. All doors may be open to him, for his uniform is evidence of his education, character, and of an opening career. Although the lowest subaltern, he may become a general or an admiral. A lieutenant or an ensign has a standing in society, by virtue of his being in the service of the Government, but there is no element of respectability in the service of a clerk, inspector, or special agent, which would entitle him to be recognized, even by a member of Congress. I cannot believe that the reason of this is that the civil service is in itself less worthy of respect than the military, but it is not because the element of honor, which is inherent in the one, has not hitherto been added to the other? All serve alike under the flag, and while the glory cannot be equal, no discredit should be cast on either class of public servants by reason of their service.

We propose to lay to the root of this great corruption not only the ax but the spade, and to leave neither seed nor succulent root of these vicious practices. As a general rule it may be stated that very few candidates for the public service have presented themselves who have succeeded in other business. Not that this rule is universal, or, if universal, that it has not provided the Government with many good officers; but every one knows that men who prosper in the active business pursuits of life are seldom candidates for Government offices. If any young man in a family of influential political connections has not shown sufficient talent to justify the belief that he can earn a living in business, or in any of the learned professions, or if any one who has not succeeded in the career which he may have chosen, happens to have political friends, we are quite sure to find his name mentioned as being a suitable person to fill some Government office. The appointing power has too often yielded to such solicitations. Men of this negative reputation for talent, whose indolence, indecision, and want of character, or whom even positive vice, have disqualified for success in the open competition of life, seek and obtain shelter under Governmental patronage.

BETTER RECRUITS TO BE OBTAINED FOR THE SERVICE.

While giving credit to the ability, the integrity, and the patriotism of many whom we find in the public service, how can we prevent the ingress of the ignorant, the incompetent, the indolent, the corrupt, the vicious, and the positively criminal? How can we dislodge those of these classes who have already secured places in the service? They seem to feel themselves safely intrenched, so as to defy attack. The pressure of the investigations authorized by this bill will dislodge many, but the certainty of the remedy is in its future application. The new system will not admit of recruits to the public service from any of those classes of persons. The service is to be supplied from the educated, earnest, patriotic, and ingenious youths among the American people. We propose to cleanse the stalls of political corruption, as the stable of the Grecian king was said to have been cleansed of old. The pure, fresh stream of a river turned from its course washed away the unclean accumulations of a generation; and we now propose to turn into our Augean stable the vigorous, uncorrupted life of the youth of America, and, when the corruptions are swept away, to open to it a career in which the patriotic heart can take pride. We cannot expect this proposed change of system to become at once a perfect success. Many will become stained in contact with the existing corruptions and fall dishonored and disgraced; many more will become appalled and disheartened at the task they have undertaken, but their places will be filled with better and braver men, whose final triumph will be assured and certain. Many who listen to me have seen our brave youths by hundreds fall in their assaults upon the fortresses within which the enemies of the Republic have stood intrenched. And so in the renovation of the public service many will go down and perish morally in the attempts to overcome by assault the Vicksburgs, the Port Hudsons, the Fort Fishers of our customs and revenue departments, where the thieves and their associates now sit intrenched and feel secure.

But this stream of vigorous, honest manhood will soon cleanse and reinvigorate the service of the Republic. The intelligent and patriotic youth who have aspired to serve their country have never yet had a fair chance. The class of men who seek these offices, and the mode by which they attain them, is well known to us. And one of the great vices of the present practice is that few besides persons of such exceptional description can hope to gain these appointments. There must be some political associations, some service rendered by the applicant or his friends to the party of the Administration, and perhaps some personal and social relations combined with the political to enable the applicant to obtain even a hearing. Every one of us knows the characteristics of these mendicants for office. It is not necessary to picture them by description. It is enough to know that it is not with such persons that the business of the world is to be accomplished. Never have the young men of the country or the faithful and deserving soldiers had an opportunity to have their merits for the public service considered. - What chance has the intelligent son of a mechanic who has shown signs of promise at the free schools, or of a farmer in Illinois or Kentucky, who has gained a knowledge of business in the intervals of toil, to get into the public service? None whatever, unless he consents to learn and perform all a politician's tricks, or to seek the aid of those accomplished in such arts. He must in some degree lose or seem to disregard a character for integrity, straightforwardness, and manly, upright conduct before he can be acknowledged as a suitable candidate for office. All the qualities that would make a good officer he must in some way have seemed to have lost. Perhaps not an inapt training for the melancholy service they enter upon, but it is not one that is sure to produce good public servants.

It is proposed to change all this. The entrance to the public service is to be thrown open to all. The intelligent son of the mechanic, the hopeful child of the family of the farmer, the young soldier, the youth of talent from any sphere of life, and from every part of the country, may boldly and freely enter the presence of the examining officers and require them to test his fitness for the Government service. Personal, social, or political influence, patronage in all its corrupting forms, can no longer introduce their favorites and push back the poor and worthy, unknown and unfriended, at the doorways. Qualification and merit, equal and exact justice to all, are what we are to seek and to do. Palmas qui meruit ferat should be, and I hope I may be able to say shall be, the motto of our service. Let every smart boy in the country know that he has a fair chance for employment under the Government and we shall soon have a different class of servants from those into whose hands the public business has now fallen. Under the proposed system the interest of the Government will be identical with that of its servants; its protection and assurance of employment will cause its service to be one of pleasure and not of pain and anxiety; its honors and rewards will make it a service of love and not of unappreciated toil. He will hold an assured position under the Government, which his superiors must recognize with the same respect that he yields to the experience and ability by which they hold their higher places.

PROPOSED REFORM DESTROYS BUREAUCRACY AND PATRONAGE.

It has been most strongly objected to this salutary reform that it is in its tendency bureaucratic, exclusive, aristocratic, and that the system was formed under monarchic institutions. Nothing could be said more calumnious. It is our present system that is borrowed from that of monarchies, and gives us the will and choice of the person having the appointing power, and not merit, as the passport to office, as under monarchies the king is the fountain of honor and the giver of employment. No measure could be more republican than that which we now present. The gates of the avenues to the public service are thrown open to all. Merit only can enter, and merit only can keep its place. No head of a bureau or even of a Department can protect his favorites or keep his friends or partisans in comfortable sinecures; no collector of the customs can play the autocrat in his little demesne. The whole service will be alive to its responsibilities. It will be part of the duty of an officer to see that every other performs his. No customary derelictions will be permitted to demoralize the service, and no local peculiarities to interfere with the unity of performance of duty.

In monarchic Governments, with hereditary aristocracies, where allegiance is due to the crown, and the great houses are the bulwarks of the throne, patronage, through which alone the children of the people can enter the public service, is a natural if not a necessary element of administration. In the theory of those Governments everything depends from the throne, descending through every social and political relation, until the chain ends before the people are reached. No one can ascend within the charmed circle except through the influence or patronage of some one of the privileged classes, and the gratitude of those who receive these favors, and the hopes of those who expect them, tend to strengthen the Government amid all changes of administration. Those who have attained official position feel secure, while those who seek it continue to cultivate the favor of the reigning favorites and governing families. But here, where the Government is of the people and for the people, and the administration should always endeavor to carry into effect their will, as expressed at the polls and through the laws, in the best and most effectual manner, this system of patronage is not a mere solecism, but a positive evil. It reverses the whole theory of popular government. That Government should be administered for the benefit of the whole, with the best instruments, at the least expense, without regard to the interests of any classes or class, or of persons or partisans. Yet we see at every change of administration over fifty thousand persons removed from office to make way for others of a different partisan creed, every one of whom will owe his appointment to something other than personal merit. And again all these are liable to be removed, and a similar class of successors appointed at the next change of party. If patriotism ever prompted the desire for office such a system would tend to eradicate that sentiment. It tends to weaken all the obligations of society for the purpose of strengthening a mere party; it elevates private interests above the welfare of the State; it tends to disintegrate the political fabric; and at last, as we have felt in our bitter experience, it destroys allegiance itself. That element which invigorates a monarchy corrupts the life of a republic.

THE NEW DEPARTMENT TO BE MADE FIRM AND STABLE BY HAVING THE VICE PRESIDENT AS CHIEF.

But I hear the question that arises in the minds of all that listen to me: how can the result you promise be accomplished with such machinery as Congress can create? How can a mere board of commissioners, a bureau, stand at the door of all the Departments and say who are sufficiently qualified to enter into the public service therein? How can a combination of the appointing officers be prevented which would crush such a subordinate, though independent, bureau? What is to prevent your statute from becoming as dead a letter as the provisions of the act of 1853 requiring the examination of all candidates for clerkships?

The objection is a grave one, and has deserved and received serious deliberation. It has been met by the proposition contained in the bill as reported, to create a new and independent administrative department which shall have charge of the business of selecting the candidates for these offices, whose head shall be the Vice President of the United States. So grave, so important, and yet so delicate are the duties of those charged with this selection, that it has been deemed best to place them under the protection and sanction of this great office. No Department can feel humiliated at receiving its novitiates with certificates from the ordeal of a trial department of which their superior is the chief. And it is time, and we believe that this is the occasion for causing this officer to perform some useful functions in this Government. The presidency of the Senate, as the sole duty of this officer, is rather by way of diversion and ornament than of usefulness; and no man's self-respect is heightened by feeling that his only importance in the Government is, that while he holds the second office in the Republic, his single title to respect is in the fact that by fatal accident to the first officer he will accede to the first place. A distinguished citizen, the grandson of a Vice President and President, and the son of a President, and himself once, and perhaps hereafter again a candidate for the office of Vice President, has written that no office could be so easily lopped off and dispensed with in our Government as that of the Vice Presidency. Madison called it an "unprofitable dignity," and Jefferson, when he accepted the place, did not attempt to disguise his contempt for its insignificance in every respect except that of being the stepping-stone to the first place in the Republic.

Once when President Washington started upon his tour through the southern States in 1791, he requested the Vice President to attend and to preside at the Cabinet meetings that might be held in his absence, and this was the first and has been the last recognition of the Vice President as a possible adviser of the President, or of having any right to take part in the Administration. Although elected upon the same ticket as the President, and thus committed to the policy of the presidential administration, and in case of the succession, presumed to intend to carry it out, he has been excluded hitherto from all voice in shaping that policy, and except in the instance cited has never been admitted to the council board. We have had sufficiently severe lessons of the impolicy and injustice of this course; and although this bill does not give him the right to a seat in the Cabinet, yet it adds weight to the reasons why he should be invited to become a member of that council. It will also have another important effect. It imposes upon the incumbent of that office some of the gravest and most delicate duties in the administration of this Government. The people, and their representatives in the nominating conventions, will be careful to whom they offer the chance of election to this high office. They will not throw it away, as at many times hitherto, to a mere chief of a faction, whose disaffection the party may desire to conciliate; nor to a neophyte, nor to a renegade, nor to an apostate, whose nomination may divide the adversary. But they will find it to their interest to nominate a person qualified not only to administer the mild rules of the Senate, but also to preside in trials for impeachment, and have the learning and experience in administration which will qualify him to be the chief of the department of the civil service, and not only to select the best candidates for that service, but also to try with justice and impartiality all the cases that may arise whereby any of these subordinates may lose their places. Not the least of the advantages of the proposed measure is that the people may obtain candidates for the Vice Presidency of a higher grade of talent and character than many that they have been compelled to vote for or against heretofore.

ECONOMIC CONSIDERATIONS FOR THIS REFORM.

But the economic considerations for this measure are the main grounds upon which it is urged by the Committee of Retrenchment. What has been said is but the repetition of axioms. All will agree that good servants in office are more desirable than poor ones; that the good are more likely to be obtained by care in the selection; that a wise choice and judicious approval will secure the fit and reject the unfit; that such means of choice with beneficial results are attainable; and that a system thus constructed and operated is better than the no system which we now have. But, every one will ask, how about the cost of it? Will not the expense increase with the admitted benefit, and the proportion be the same in the end? To these questions we are prepared to give explicit answers. And these answers are based not upon conjecture, or inference, or concurrence of opinion, but upon the direct and positive testimony of the greater number of the chief officers in the civil service. The preponderance of evidence in favor of the proposed reform is so great that there can hardly be said to be a minority.

The committee have received reports from four hundred and forty-six (446) officers confirmed by the Senate, in all branches of the civil service, whose subordinates within the operation of this act number twelve thousand eight hundred and nineteen, (12,819;) and of these officers, three hundred and sixty-two, (362,) having eleven thousand five hundred and sixty-one (11,561) subordinates, express themselves decidedly in favor of the proposed reform. Of the residue, twelve (12) officers, having one hundred and forty-three (143) subordinates, express a decided opposition to it, and the remainder either do not answer the vital questions at all, or answer them evasively, or express the opinion that the proposed measure would be either inapplicable or ineffectual in their districts. This minority consists chiefly of postmasters in small towns and collectors in decayed ports or in internal revenue districts which yield an insignificant revenue. Wherever the business of the Government is large there is a call for active, energetic, intelligent men for these subordinate offices, and the measure is favorably considered.

It is a pleasure, also, to recognize in their reports the uniform and unqualified testimony in favor of the female employés of the Government. This bill proposes to give them an assured position in the service, and all who testify upon the subject agree that their numbers may be increased under the proposed system with profit to the Government. These reports show that they are diligent in the performance of their duties, and that they are not speculators or thieves. In the grades of offices to which they have been assigned, as an experiment and upon sufferance hitherto, there are no more honest, faithful, and capable persons in the service.

The answers to the questions submitted by the committee support the propositions in every view, and especially in the economic. We can state the result of this evidence in the brief proposition, that by adopting this system the Government can obtain double the amount of the present service at two thirds of the present expense. The immediate cost of the staff of the new department is but a trifle to the great saving to be achieved by the proper performance of their duties. The losses by defalcations which this system would prevent have been annually hitherto more than tenfold the proposed cost of the entire department. Besides, the fees prescribed for examinations and certificates will make this department nearly, if not quite, self-sustaining. But the great saving will be in the increase of the collections. If this Government had its dues the national debt would soon be extinguished. Why is there a deficit of tens of millions in the tax on spirits? Why is it that whole cargoes elude the customs? Why is it that smugglers are the chief importers on our extended frontier? It may as well be admitted and stated in sharp popular phrase; the smugglers are too smart for the revenue officers. I omit here designedly the element of corruption, and assume that honesty is a quality of all the servants of the Government. But talent does not necessarily prefer unlawful courses to the lawful; and the design of this measure is to secure it on the side of the Government. It has been announced here by the highest authority, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that there are few frauds upon the internal revenue which are accomplished without the connivance of some official, and we now seek to make it the interest as well as the duty of every official to refuse such connivance, and to become wholly devoted to the service of the Government. Finance and revenue are being developed into a science, and the fiscal service should become a profession. When competent men shall be trained to the assessment and collection of taxes and customs, and when it shall be made their duty to report the results of their experience to their departments and to Congress, the burdens of taxation may be more wisely apportioned; and, if not actually lightened, may be so distributed as to be less severely felt.

THE REFORM PRACTICABLE.

I do not fail to hear the scoffs of the enemies of this Government at the statement of these propositions. They affect to believe that virtue in the public service cannot exist. They are continually declaiming that the Government cannot collect the taxes on whisky and tobacco, nor the duties on articles of luxury. Their reason for their pretended belief, freely offered, is that the infirmity of human nature is such that it cannot resist the temptations to dereliction of duty offered by those whose interest it is to defraud the revenue. Oaths, they say, will not prevent this corruption; bonds will not furnish sufficient obligation or security; and this defiant boast has been almost warranted by the history of our civil service. Many have been the defalcations, and few the recoveries from sureties. Many have been the omissions to collect the Government dues, and few the removals in consequence. Thousands are now drawing their salaries from the Treasury who know that their delinquencies have cost that Treasury a hundredfold the amount they are paid. But is it so with the other branches of the public service? Who ever loads his declamations with cases of peculation among the officers of the Army and Navy? Who ever charges them with connivance at stealing? Who thinks of exacting bonds of an admiral, or sureties from the commander of a department? And why? Because their honor and the good of the service are one. The admiral of a fleet may disburse more than the collector of a port receives; but how different is the position of each in the national service! I desire to see the collector of a port or of a district raised to an equal position to that of a general or a commodore, but it can only be by introducing into the civil service the same esprit de corps, and the same element of honor, that dignifies and secures from reproach the service of arms.

In all revolutions, revolts, and civil commotions, from the most ancient times to the present, historians have remarked that the chief causes of these evils were to be found in the civil administration, and that the soldiers stood aloof until the necessities of the State required them to intervene. The cause for this has been found not so much in their discipline as in their patriotism; the State had made their service honorable, and their honor became a bulwark to the State. Even the imperial historian of our times has recorded that in the tumultuous period that preceded the fall of the liberties of Rome, as in those that preceded his own reign, honor and patriotism had fled from the civil service and were only to be found under the flag.

I have such faith in the intelligence and patriotism of the American people that I believe the result can be attained in the service and arts of peace as well as in those of war; and under the instructions of the committee I urge this measure as one great step to that desired end. When I say that we estimate the saving in the expense of the collection of the revenues at one half of the present cost, the total of which is fifteen millions annually, and that the additional amount that can be collected from the subjects of taxation proposed to be retained by the Committee of Ways and Means is at least fifty millions in the internal revenue and twenty-five millions in the customs, and that we have the evidence to show that our estimates are within the mark, it will need no figures of speech in addition to these figures of arithmetic to commend to our heavily-taxed constituents the merits of the measure we propose.

To insure complete and immediate success it would be necessary to expel all the thieves at once from the public service. This must be a work of time. The thieves infest every department. They are to be found in the small post offices as well as in the great custom-houses. They are like the trichinæ in the animal system, not only injurious when first introduced, but capable of infinite reproduction to the danger of fatal results. There is no branch of the service where they are not to be found, and their example is so contagious that honesty becomes the exception instead of the rule. There is no cure but one for such a disease. No new pests must be introduced. Those who have effected a lodgment may be killed or excised. The honest and intelligent young men who will enter the service will soon drive out many who are lazy and corrupt, by exposure of their delinquencies. We may not even be without the hope that some of the thieves may be transferred from the custom-houses to the penitentiaries. But prevention is the only sure cause of cure. While the doorways are thrown open to all comers, let the preliminary ordeals and the subsequent probations be such that the incompetent and unworthy shall all be turned back. When that result can be accomplished every citizen will feel that his property, and even his liberty and his life, will be more secure.

THE MEASURE ENTIRELY IN HARMONY WITH REPUBLICAN INSTITUTIONS.

In short, Mr. Speaker, this measure is intended to complete and perfect the great idea of the Republic. Before the people, for every elective office in which conformance to the policy of an Administration is a qualification, there is always an open competition. The people judge of the qualifications of every candidate for political office, and decide, for the time being, peremptorily. The officers so elected by the people are accountable to the people, and their supervision is constant, severe, and, in the main, accurate. But, with regard to administrative officers, the aids of the people's servants, there is no such criticism, accountability, or judgment. It is proposed to create a tribunal which shall accomplish all that could be attained from the wisest popular judgment. When this shall be done the idea of the Republic will be complete; the people will elect to political office those with whom they are best satisfied, and will secure in the administrative offices the services of the best talent and the highest integrity and patriotism they can obtain. Certainly the result is to be desired; and the proposed measure may prove to be the means of securing its accomplishment.

NOT OF A TEMPORARY OR PARTISAN CHARACTER.

It is not urged as a measure of temporary expediency, or to promote any partisan interest: its purpose is to place the administrative departments of this Government in the hands of skillful and honest men, and thus to renew the health and life of the Republic. Above all others, it is a measure ad firmandam rempublicam. The structure of our Government is satisfactory to all, and whatever difference of opinion there may be about the first proposition in the well-known couplet respecting the forms of government, we can all agree, granting us the Republic, upon that expressed in its last line:

"That which is best administered is best."

I now move to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Wednesday, the 3d day of June, after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I now move, in accordance with the request of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BENTON,] to recommit the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ELA: The petition of J. T. Elliott, of the eleventh Michigan volunteers, for extra pay, due as a clerk in the department of the Cumberland.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of James G. B-nnett, jr., for change of name of the yacht l'Hirondelle to Dauntless.

By Mr. McCARTHY: The petition of J. W. Barker and 200 others, citizens of Syracuse, New York, asking for a reduction of the expenses of the Government to a peace basis, a corresponding reduction of taxes, and an adjustment of the revenue laws, so as to keep our gold and silver at home and give employment to the labor of the country.

By Mr. ROBINSON: The petition of the manufacturers of morocco in the cities of New York and Brooklyn.

By Mr. TWICHELL: A memorial of Beardslee Magnetic Electric Company, for claim as set forth in said memorial.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 15, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say that at the time the vote was taken yesterday on the motion to strike out the word "Alabama" from the bill proposing to admit that State with others to representation in Congress, I was called out of the House by a constituent and lost my vote. If I had been present I should have voted in the affirmative.

ACTION OF THE MISSOURI DELEGATION.

Mr. WOODWARD. I rise to what I suppose is a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution:

Whereas a letter has been published purporting to be addressed by members of this House to a Senator from the State of Missouri, with a view of influencing his vote upon articles of impeachment preferred by this House against the President of the United States, and now pending in the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment, which letter, as published, is as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 12, 1868.

SIR: On a consultation of the Republican members of the House of Representatives from Missouri, in view of your position on the impeachment articles, we ask you to withhold your vote on any article upon which you cannot vote affirmatively. This request is made because we believe the safety of the loyal people of the United States demands the immediate removal of Andrew Johnson from the office of President of the United States.

Respectfully,
GEORGE W. ANDERSON,
WILLIAM A. PILE,
C. A. NEWCOMB,
JOSEPH W. McCLURG,
BENJAMIN F. LOAN,
JOHN F. BENJAMIN,
JOSEPH J. GRAVELLY.

Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, United States Senate.

And whereas such a communication, if addressed to a Senator sitting in judgment upon a President of the United States, is a gross breach of the privileges of the Senate, calculated to degrade the House of Representatives and to obstruct the course of public justice; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed to inquire if the above communication has been addressed by members of this House to Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, and if it has, what is the legal character of the offense, and what penalty, if any, the House ought, in vindication of its own dignity, to inflict, as well as what provisions of law are necessary to prevent a recurrence of such wrongs, with power to send for persons and papers; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. NEWCOMB and Mr. LOAN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is about to decide whether this is or is not a question of privilege. In the opinion of the Chair it is not a question of privilege. The wording of the resolution expressly shows that it is not. The charge is that this was an infringement of the privileges of the Senate. It has not yet occurred, in the recollection of the Chair, that the House of Representatives has been recognized by the Senate as the protector of its privileges. If the privileges of the Senate are assailed, that body is competent to protect its own privileges; nor would the House consent that the Senate of the United States should assume to protect its privileges. The Chair, therefore, does not think that it is a question of privilege.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. There is another clause that—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir; but I wish to call the attention of the Chair to another clause in the resolution; and if the resolution be modified it may then be a question of privilege. There is a clause of the resolution which says that the action of these gentlemen was calculated to degrade the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to say that I will modify the resolution by striking out the allusion to the privileges of the Senate. That is not at all essential to the purpose of the resolution. If that is the only reason why it is not a question of privilege I will strike out those words.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. LOAN. I desire to say that all the communication had by the members of this House from Missouri with the Senator, so far as I am advised, was at his special instance and request, and that paper was signed at his instance and request.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. So much the worse.

Mr. NEWCOMB. That was the remark I was about to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has modified the resolution by striking out what the Chair had supposed to be the most important part of it. The Chair is still of the opinion that it is not a question of privilege. From a hurried examination of the precedents to be found in the Digest, the Chair cannot see on what ground it could be held to be a question of privilege, unless it were "an alleged corrupt combination." But it does not appear that any corruption is charged in this case upon members of the House. As to the intercourse between members of the House and Senators, whether oral or written, the Chair cannot see that that properly involves a question of privilege, unless corrupt influences were used.

Mr. WOODWARD. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer that resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. UPSON and others objected.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, the first business during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on the Judiciary, which committee is entitled to another morning hour. At the expiration of the morning hour on last private bill day the pending question was upon the engrossment of House bill No. 65, for the relief of William McGarrahan, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. Upon this question the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] yield to allow me to propound an inquiry to the member from Missouri, [Mr. PILE?]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot yield now.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to inquire what that member means by his motions and gesticulations, which are worthy of the ring rather than of this House?

The SPEAKER. That language is certainly not parliamentary. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] has any charge to make against a member of the House he must present it in the usual form. The Chair did not see what the gentleman complains of, and does not know what it was.

Mr. PILE. I intended no insult; nothing of the kind.

Mr. WOODWARD. The gentleman stood there making cabalistic signs. [Laughter.] As he belongs to a party that claims to have all the moral sense and decency of the country, I wish to inquire what he meant by standing on this floor, and, in the presence of the Speaker, making offensive gestures toward me?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has any charge to make against any member he must reduce it to writing and present it in proper form.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the remarks which have been made here by the gentleman on the other side go into the Globe as part of the debates and proceedings of this House?

The SPEAKER. They do. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] rose in his place and claimed that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] had improperly treated him. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania used language which the Chair ruled to be out of order. If he has any complaint to make against a member of this House it should be done in the shape of specific charges presented to this House for its action. The Chair will again say that he did not see the action complained of by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

WILLIAM MCGARRAHAN.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 65, for the relief of William McGarrahan.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that the tract of land known as the Panoche Grande Rancho, in the State of California, granted by Governor Manuel Micheltona to Vincente P. Gomez in the year 1844, and by said Gomez conveyed to William McGarrahan on the 22d day of December, 1857, surveyed by the United States surveyor general for the State of California, and approved by him on the 11th day of September, in the year 1862, and which said survey is now on file in the General Land Office, be, and the same is, in all respects, hereby fully confirmed to said William McGarrahan, upon this condition, however, that the said McGarrahan shall, within twelve months after the passage of this act, pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $1 25 per acre for the lands embraced within the said survey.

The second section provides that upon the payment of the said sum of money to the Treasurer of the United States by said McGarrahan, the said Treasurer shall give a certificate therefor, and upon the presentation thereof to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a patent shall be issued to said William McGarrahan for said lands.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This subject was examined by the Committee on the Judiciary for several days and weeks. Eight members of the committee took part in the examination, seven of whom concurred in the report; one of them, my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BOWWELL,] did not concur in the report.

The Committee on the Judiciary, charged with the investigation of this claim, have devoted to it more time and care, I presume, than is usually extended to such cases. The case came before the Thirty Ninth Congress on the memorial of McGarrahan, asking for the confirmation of a grant made by the Mexican Government to one Vincente P. Gomez in the year 1844. Under the act of Congress of 1851, establishing a board of commissioners for the settlement and adjustment of land claims in California, this grant was presented before the commissioners by Gomez. After a hearing of the case the commissioners decided that sufficient proof had been presented to establish the validity of the grant; but, inasmuch as no proof of occupancy or possession had been submitted, they decided against the confirmation of the grant.

The case was taken on appeal to the United States district court for California. Before it was heard in that tribunal, the celebrated Frémont case was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in which it was held that possession was not necessary to a valid claim. Thereupon the decision of the land commissioners was reversed, and a decree pronounced confirming the grant in Gomez. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and at the instance of the present claimant, who, after the confirmation by decree of the Supreme Court, had purchased this grant from Gomez, a transcript was sent up to the Supreme Court, placed before the Attorney General, and upon argument he decided to ask the court to dismiss the appeal, which was done. Subsequently it was represented to the Supreme Court that there had been some fraudulent practices upon the part of the United States district attorney, and the mandate which had been issued by the Supreme Court to the district court of California in pursuance of the dismissal of the appeal was recalled. A considerable amount of difficulty was placed in the way of this claimant by the adverse parties—nominally the United States, but really a mining company—thus preventing the reaching of a conclusion in the case until the year 1866, when the Supreme Court decided not to dismiss the appeal which had been taken by the United States and ruled the case against the claimant, McGarrahan. He alleges (and the committee is entirely satisfied of the fact) that the case has never been properly before the court; that the court never has passed upon the case which has been submitted to the committee; and of this there can be no doubt upon an examination of the record. Hence he has made his application to Congress for the confirmation of his grant.

The committee, in view of all the circumstances and equities which have been developed in this case, have recommended the passage of the bill which has been read at the Clerk's desk, and which is to this effect: that the claimant be permitted to purchase the land embraced within the limits of the survey of the grant now on file in the General Land Office, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, which will amount in the aggregate to $23,040. The contesting party—really the New Idria Mining Company—claims to be permitted to enter under the act of 1866 certain portions of this land, embracing what there is of mineral, within the limits of the grant. If they should be permitted thus to enter, the amount which the Government would receive would be $9,500; so that in point of dollars and cents, considering the worthless character of most of this grant, the advantage to the Government lies in the passage of this bill.

I have made a brief statement of the case. I will now yield ten minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who does not concur in the report of the committee; and I shall present in conclusion such argument as may be necessary on my part.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, it has happened in regard to this application that I have differed with the other members of the committee; and I wish to state very briefly the grounds on which my opinion is based. The mining occupancy involved in this case is undoubtedly of great value, ranking as third or fourth in value of the quicksilver mines that have been opened. This matter was fully investigated before the committee several weeks or months ago; and although I then formed an opinion as to the merits of the case, some of the facts have in the intervening time disappeared from my recollection, so that I may not now be able to recall all those which might be of interest in the discussion; but I can state to the House, if it will give me its attention for a few minutes, the reasons which, in the beginning, controlled me in the opinion I formed adverse to the application of this claimant.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the Frémont case, which has been the basis, to a large extent, of all subsequent decisions, held, as I understand the report of the case in 22 or 23 Howard, that where all the papers necessary to a perfect record title were found in the Mexican archives the possession of the estate granted by the Mexican Government is not indispensable to the recognition of the title by the courts of the United States. But that court in a subsequent case, the case of Castro, in 24 Howard, page 350, has laid down a rule which is applicable to the case under consideration, and which seems to me to be sound. As this rule is stated very clearly in the report of the case, I beg the attention of the House while I read it. The court declare that it should appear in such cases—

"First, that the grant was obtained and made in the manner the law required at some former time and recorded in the proper public office; secondly, that the papers in that office, or some of them, have been lost or destroyed; and thirdly, the applicant must support this proof by showing that within a reasonable time after the grant was made there was a judicial survey of the land, and actual possession by him by acts of ownership exercised over it."

Now, admitting all the papers produced here to be genuine, the facts proved in the case are these: that the petition, the map, the request of the general authorities to the local government for information, and the report of the local government, are according to the usual form of proceedings in such cases, but that final decree of the General Government confirmed by the provisional assembly is wanting. Therefore, this case fails to come within the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in the Frémont case, to wit, the record title is imperfect.

In all those cases the court has held there must be actual possession in order to confirm the title. There was no actual possession in this case; and therefore the Supreme Court—my opinion being somewhat different from that of the chairman of the committee in reference to the opinion of the court in the case of Gomez vs. the United States—the Supreme Court of the United States, as I believe, in this report distinctly declared upon the merits of this case that this case could not be confirmed. Therefore, upon investigation, I am of the opinion that this House should adhere to the rule established by the Supreme Court. It seems to me to be a safe and sound rule, where the papers necessary to perfect the record title of a grant have been found in the Mexican archives, possession is not indispensably requisite to the recognition of title by our courts; but in those cases where the record title is imperfect, and is made up by secondary testimony from the outside, that possession on the part of the claimant under the grant is indispensably requisite to the recognition of the title by the courts of the United States. I hold that to be a safe, a sound, a wise judicial rule, which will stand the test under all circumstances.

Since the examination by the committee in the investigation which I have given to the decisions of the courts in California and to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, I am satisfied there are other valid reasons why this claim should not be recognized by this House. This claimant, McGarrahan, claims under a grant made, or claimed to have been made, to one Vincente P. Gomez. Now, I find upon an examination of various land cases in California and in the Supreme Court of the United States that the testimony of this man Gomez has been as effectually destroyed as a witness as it is possible for that of any witness to be destroyed in any court of justice; and though this fact does not show Gomez may not have been an honest man in this transaction, yet, taken in connection with another fact developed before the committee, that Gomez, since he testified before the land commissioners in the California courts as to the validity of his title—his testimony going to the support of his title—has repudiated, as I believe, the testimony then given by him.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Gomez has not testified in any court touching this grant.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I accept the correction of the chairman of the committee, though my recollection was otherwise; but he was the grantee, a clerk, as it was understood, in one of the Mexican departments, and his claim to this grant was based upon his services there. In 1 Hoffman, in the case of the United States vs. Limantour, this man Gomez is spoken of in this manner:

"The expediente in the Yerba Buena case is found in 1852, in an office which was not its proper place of custody, by a person whose own confession in another case shows him to have been engaged in fabricating titles, and whose character to this court, which has so often been called on to pass upon his credibility, no attempt has been made to vindicate."

In several other cases to which I have reference, but which I will not trouble the House with, his character for veracity in matters of this kind is also impeached.

Now, then, the remaining fact which is essential to the establishment of this title is the testimony, as I understand, of one José Abrigo, who testifies, according to the report of the committee:

"That Gomez was a clerk in his office, and that in 1845 he (Gomez) showed him a title to the land named, together with a map of the property; that the papers were signed by the governor and secretary, and that he was well acquainted with the signatures of these officers, having often seen them write; that the archives in which these papers were passed into the possession of the American army, July 7, 1846."

Now, if I understand the case, the remaining fact essential to the perfection of this title, namely, that the grant was actually made by the Mexican Government, rests upon the testimony of this José Abrigo.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I yield five minutes more.

Mr. PRUYN. I would like to ask the gentleman how it happens that this question has not been decided by the courts, and why it is brought to Congress?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The court by two separate decisions at least, by one on the merits, and a decision based upon the technical proceedings, have refused to confirm this title, and it is brought here on its equity.

Now, then, calling the attention of the House to the standing of José Abrigo, who is spoken of in Hoffman's Reports, (vol. 1, 424,) the second witness on whom reliance is chiefly placed by the claimant to prove the consideration for which this grant was made to José Abrigo, they go on and give his testimony, and then say:

"It is proved beyond all doubt that nearly all the foregoing statements of José Abrigo are false."

Then, again, speaking of this same witness, the court say:

"If any explanation of the evidence, apparently conclusive of the falsehood of Abrigo's testimony, were possible, it would surely have been offered by that witness himself. Since the discovery and production of his books he has not been recalled to the stand, nor has any attempt been made to show that there were other books or accounts in this office which in any respect corresponded to the description given by him of the mode in which they were kept, or their contents."

Such is the character given to Abrigo in another case by the court before which a claim for land was pending. This same Abrigo, as I understand it, is the only witness relied upon to prove the existence of the grant finally.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, signified his dissent.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I so understood it. At any rate, whether he be the sole witness or not, he is a witness reported by the committee as having testified to the title, and I am not aware of its having been testified to by anybody else, although I may be in error about that.

Now, in conclusion, I wish to say I believe from all the testimony presented that this McGarrahan is an upright, honest man. I have seen nothing and heard nothing disclosed by the investigation to the contrary. It is also probably true that there were frauds practiced in one establishment of that title on the part of the district attorney of the United States, who was himself the owner in part of the land now claimed by Mr. McGarrahan, when he was acting district attorney of the United States, and consented to the proceeding in court; and the Supreme Court finally, in passing upon this title, condemned that proceeding and set it aside.

Mr. FERRISS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand him to say that this cause was once decided upon its merits in the courts of law and equity. I desire to know what relief can this Congress give to a party that cannot be granted by a court of equity?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not care to dwell upon all the questions that may arise in this case. I may have been in error in some of the statements I have made, but I am not in error, I believe, upon the main fact, and that is that this case does not come up to the rule established by the Supreme Court, which rule seems to me to be a reasonable one.

I may also say, I believe, that from the testimony disclosed on the part of the New Idria Mining Company there was possibly on the part of the officers of the United States improper if not corrupt proceedings. I am not sure but that is true on both sides. On the side of the claimant previous to the time when he came into possession of the claim there were improper proceedings, as I am pretty sure there have been by his opponent since he has been engaged in this expensive controversy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's additional five minutes have expired.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to go on. It is a very important matter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I yield a minute or two more.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have said there is no evidence disclosing any wrongdoing on the part of Mr. McGarrahan. But he holds under a title which was established in the courts of California by a proceeding which seems to me improper, and which was condemned by the Supreme Court of the United States as improper, to wit, that Pacificus Ord, who was himself the then owner of this claim, appeared before the judge of the district court and assented to proceedings to which perhaps he would not have assented if he had been entirely disinterested. If, then, this title was in any way imperfect in the hands of Gomez, of course McGarrahan has taken it upon himself with its imperfections; and if it is his misfortune to be a claimant under an imperfect title, I do not know that is within the just province of Congress to give him assistance. I deem him an unfortunate man in this matter. There can be no doubt about that, and he is contesting with a company which has accumulated probably a large sum of money out of this mine, which is in itself very valuable. And this leads me to say that the act of 1866, by which claimants are allowed to take the mineral lands of this country for five dollars an acre, is very bad policy, in my judgment, for this Government. Here is the third or fourth mine in the world for the production of quicksilver, which is to be sold, and it must go one way or the other, either to this McGarrahan for $1 25 an acre upon the equity of the case, or to this New Idria Company for five dollars an acre, yielding to the Government ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars, more or less, for property which would probably sell in the market for hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not half a million or a million.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, resumed the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask if the title to this mine is not in the United States to this day?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I would ask what justice there is or what right we have to give it away to this man or to othermen?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will answer that question before I conclude the case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let us repeal the law and keep this property, worth millions of dollars, for the Government.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will hear what the case is. I desire to have this bill disposed of to-day. I intend to yield most of my time, and perhaps all of it, in the first hour, to other gentlemen who desire to be heard, reserving what I may have to say in reply until the second hour. I wish to have the previous question seconded before the expiration of the morning hour, so that I can have an hour afterward to close the case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] wishes to be heard in opposition to the bill, and I will yield to him for fifteen minutes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I may have to ask the indulgence of the House for a little more time. This matter has been before the courts in some shape or other for nearly fifteen years, and to-day this body is sitting in the capacity of a court of appeals upon the decision of the Supreme Court. We are sitting to-day as jurors to judge and determine the validity of a claim to seventeen thousand acres of land, as I understand it, which claim is disputed upon two grounds. First, that the grant itself never existed at all; that the claim is a fraud by reason of being founded upon no title; and in the next place, that it is a fraud by reason of the fraudulent location of the Panoche Grande, which was originally located some forty or fifty miles above the spot where they now locate it for the purpose of securing this quicksilver mine.

Mr. Speaker, this man Gomez, who was the patentee, who claims to have been the original owner of this Panoche Grande, has been proven to be and decided by the courts to be a man who manipulated other fraudulent patents for lands in Mexico, in the Limantour case, involving nine hundred and forty square leagues of land. Gomez is the main witness in McGarrahan's case; and another witness in the fraudulent Limantour case was Abrigo, who is the only living witness who undertakes to swear that he ever saw this patent of Gomez under which McGarrahan claims. Therefore Gomez, the man who claims this seventeen thousand acres of land, Abrigo, the main witness to this claim, both stand convicted by the courts, both have been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to have been engaged in that magnificent fraud to appropriate to themselves nearly a thousand square miles of land; that cannot be gainsayed; and Limantour, with as much propriety, might have come to this Congress and asked Congress to reverse the decision of the Supreme Court as for this man, McGarrahan, to come here and ask Congress to sustain this claim of Gomez.

And let me call the attention of the House to one fact which, if there was no other fact in the case, would show the character of this claim as established by the committee themselves. The committee in their report say, or they mean to say, that the title of McGarrahan is complete. They say that McGarrahan bought this land in good faith. In their report the committee say that Gomez owned this land; that Gomez had a patent for it; that Gomez was the legal owner, and that he transferred that title in good faith to McGarrahan. Now, if that be so, then I ask was not Gomez the legal owner of this land? and if he was, is not McGarrahan now the legal owner of the land? and if this title be good, then does not McGarrahan hold his title against the world?

Now, if it is true, as the committee have said in their report, that that grant was good, then what right have we to say that McGarrahan shall pay $1 25 an acre for his own land? Yet that is what the committee say, and that gives character to this whole transaction—I mean character to the claim. The report says:

"The title to the land claimed, and which he asks that he may be allowed to purchase?"

What! Purchase his own land? If Gomez had a good title to the land, then it is McGarrahan's own land; and why should he purchase it? If the title to the land as held by Gomez was not valid, then this claim is a base fraud, and it cannot be consummated in the hands of McGarrahan any more than in the hands of Gomez. And if McGarrahan owns the land, then what right have the committee to say that he shall pay $1 25 an acre for it? No, sir; his title is not good for anything—

"The title to the land claimed, and which he asks that he may be allowed to purchase, is now vested in the Government of the United States, and it is merely a question whether he shall be permitted to secure that which, in the judgment of your committee, he acquired title to by virtue of the Mexican grant aforesaid, or it shall fall into the hands of a corporation known as the New Idria Mining Company, which has been resisting his claim for years, and paying the expenses of the efforts of said company out of the proceeds of the mines, the title to which rests in the United States."

If the Gomez title is good, then the land now belongs to McGarrahan; if it is not good, then it belongs to the Government of the United States. The committee say in their report that the title does belong to the Government of the United States. If it is in the Government of the United States, then it is because this claim is a fraudulent one; it is because these men sought by fraud and forgery to build up a claim against this Government. And then the committee step in and say that they will allow McGarrahan to buy this land. Now, why should they say so in face of the facts in the case?

As I understand it, the only question is really as to this title of Gomez, and that the committee concede to be bad. Gomez said he got his title from the Mexican Government. Now, mark: this claim came before the board organized by Congress in 1851 to settle these private land claims seven or eight years after the date of the grant. He came before the board and asked them to establish this grant, but the board said there was no proof of occupancy, and they dismissed his claim. The law provided an appeal from that tribunal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the case was carried up there. And let me say right here: Gomez makes his petition for three leagues of land; takes the judgment of the Supreme Court and an order for three leagues of land at one time, which I will refer to hereafter. And then he modifies his claim so as to embrace four leagues of land. What is the proof that Gomez brought before the land commissioners in 1851? Only this man Abrigo, who stands not only convicted of perjury, but of a perjury parallel to this. Gomez and Abrigo, being clerks of some sort in one of the departments of the Mexican Government, had facilities of access to the records, and facilities for making patents, which they did. They made up this Limantour case, as I said. They were witnesses in the Limantour case, and were convicted of perjury and forgery by the Supreme Court of the United States. In this case Gomez was the claimant, and Abrigo, his partner in the fraud, was a witness. In a report submitted by the Committee on the Judiciary at the first session of this Congress, they say that Abrigo gives this testimony:

"In the year 1845 the said Gomez showed to me a title to the land called La Panoche Grande, near the rancho of San Luis Gonzaga, belonging to Francisco Panoche, issued by Governor Micheltorena in the latter part of 1844 or the beginning of 1845. I do not recollect which. Said Gomez was at that time one of the clerks of the commissaries general of California, of which office I was the chief. After showing me the said title papers the said Gomez placed the same for safe-keeping among the papers belonging to the archives of said office, where it remained until the said archives were taken possession of by the American forces July 7, 1846, to the best of my recollection."

He does not swear to the boundaries in that description which he pretends to have seen. He does not swear as to the location of that patent; no one swears to it. He merely swears that he saw a claim in the land office. Yet, strange as it may appear, although those records were lost, no other records of Mexico make the most distant allusion to this claim or the granting of this patent. This man Abrigo, a man who was convicted of forgery and perjury, swore thus in this case.

Another man, José Castro, also figures in this transaction. He testifies that at one time he was on the Panoche Grande; that he knows it is the land in question in this case, because he camped on it fifteen days. Yet the truth is that the Panoche Grande, as claimed in the original description, is entirely destitute of water, unless it be alkali water. There is no place on those three leagues of land, if located where it was supposed to be in the outset, where a man could camp fifteen days. So that Castro must be guilty of perjury in making the statement that he camped on this Panoche Grande for fifteen days.

But there is another fact to which I want to call attention. This man Gomez was poor. He says in the petition which he pretends to have presented to the Governor of Mexico that he wants this land—for what? For agricultural purposes. Yet you cannot raise a hill of corn on that which they pretended in the first place was this tract of land. Hear what he says:

"Desiring to devote myself to the interesting pursuit of agriculture, which is of such vital importance to this department, and which, as yet, is in its infancy, I pray your excellency to be pleased to concede me in property the place known by the name of Panoche Grande," &c.

"In view of what I have set forth, I pray your excellency to be pleased to take my petition into consideration, in order that in this way I may obtain the means necessary for the support of my large family."

Yet on these three or four leagues of land you would not be able to raise white peas. And the proof is that from 1844 down to 1852-53 he never saw it, never thought of this thing, until there was supposed to be some value attached to it.

Now, these are substantially the points in this case: first, that there is fraud in the claim; and next, that there is fraud in its location. The map which I have before me shows where the northern boundary of the Panoche Grande is as they first claimed it; and where they claim it now, to cover these quicksilver mines, is forty miles south of where the location should have been according to the original description.

Now, these are the facts. It may be disputed upon the other side, but still it is conceded substantially that this patent is a fraud, because if it be not a fraud, then, as I have already said, the legal title is in Gomez or his heirs. Besides, the committee keep out of view one point, which shows that there was fraud in the inception of this patent and fraud in its consummation. This case went from the board authorized by the act of 1851 to settle these claims into the Supreme Court of the United States. At that time Mr. Pacificus Ord was the United States district attorney in the State of California. Mr. Ord becomes half owner of these four leagues of land; and after that commences another fraud. I call it a fraud, because the Supreme Court of the United States say that Ord was guilty of a fraud. He goes into the courts and winks at the reversal of the decision of this board of commissioners; and this is the decision referred to by gentlemen of the committee when they say that there was a decision at one time in his favor. It was a decision obtained without argument. The United States was not represented, because the district attorney, the officer whose duty it was to represent the United States, was interested against the United States, he being the owner of one half of this land. The title for one half was in Ord; yet gentlemen do not think it necessary that these parties should even go through the formality of getting Ord to reconvey the title to Gomez.

Notwithstanding one half of the title was conveyed to Pacificus Ord, the United States district attorney, in utter disregard of the title conveyed by Gomez to Pacificus Ord, this man Gomez sold the title to the whole grant to McGarrahan for $1,100. If I thought it proper, I might state what was the consideration for which this grant was conveyed by Gomez to McGarrahan.

Here is another evidence of fraud. Gomez could not hold one half of the grant and Pacificus Ord could not hold one half of the grant and at the same time Gomez could not convey the whole grant to McGarrahan. It is all pretense and nothing else.

After this thing had slept for four or five years, the attention of the Attorney General of the United States was called to it. Proceedings were instituted. They battled for years, until finally this case was decided on its merits. For fifteen years it baffled the courts of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States finally decided against the grant.

Now, what do the committee say in their reports. In the first session of the Fortieth Congress, the Judiciary Committee say, as a general rule, the decisions of the court should be final. I suppose so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. VAN WYCK. They say that as a general rule the decisions of the Supreme Court should be final. I suppose in all cases where the rights of property are concerned we all acknowledge the decisions of the Supreme Court should be final. Whatever we may think of the decisions of the Supreme Court on political questions, I suppose their decisions upon the rights of property and other questions are binding upon the American people. They say as a general rule that the decisions of the Supreme Court should be final; they should be binding upon questions of the rights of property.

Now, the Supreme Court has said that this is a fraud. They say that the conduct of Pacificus Ord was fraudulent. Let us see what is the record. The court examined fully into the merits of the case, having all the facts before them, and what do they say? I will read it from the Supreme Court reports:

"Regarding the case as regularly before the court, it becomes necessary to examine the merits of the claim. Some suspicion attaches to the claim because it is made for four leagues of land, whereas the only document introduced in support of it, which is of the least probative force, represents the original claimant as having asked for but three leagues. Document referred to purports to be the petition of the claimant to the Governor, and there is appended to it the usual informe; but there is no concession or grant, nor is there any satisfactory evidence that any title of any kind was ever issued by the Governor to the claimant. He states in his petition to the land commissioners that he obtained the map in the record from the proper officers of the department; but the alleged fact is not satisfactorily proved. Four witnesses were examined by the claimant before the land commissioners, but only one of the number pretended that he had ever seen the grant; and his statements are quite too indefinite to be received as satisfactory proof.

"Instead of proving possession under the grant it is satisfactorily shown that he never occupied it at all; and it is doubtful if he ever saw the premises during the Mexican rule. Land commissioners rejected the claim, but before it came up for hearing in the district court his attorney had been appointed district attorney of the United States; and the proofs show that he conveyed two leagues of the land to the district attorney. Circumstances of the confirmation of the claim in the district court are fully stated in the opinion of this court, given when the mandate was revoked and recalled. Comment upon those circumstances is unnecessary, except to say that the confirmation was fraudulently obtained."

Now briefly, Mr. Speaker, these are the facts of the case. We have fraud on the part of Gomez; fraud on the part of Pacificus Ord, the United States district attorney; fraud on the part of all the persons mixed up with this matter, and on the decision of the case by the court of last resort on its merits the whole grant was repudiated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from California, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I have to take the responsibility of casting a vote in this case. It is a contest between citizens of the State from which I am a Representative. It is one of a class of cases which have given more trouble in our State than anything else which has ever annoyed our people. But I cannot "dodge" my responsibility. I am here as a Representative, and I must do my duty.

The Committee on the Judiciary have extended the courtesy to me to allow me to attend in the committee-room to hear the argument; and I have come to the conclusion that the claimant, Mr. McGarrahan, is right in his claim; and so I shall have to vote. In answer to remarks which have been made I say that, whether Gomez was the owner of this land or not, he gave to the claimant a deed for a valuable consideration. As lawyers understand it, that makes him the owner against all parties, except the Government of the United States. That deed was obtained by McGarrahan long before the New Idria mine was discovered or taken possession of. Then as against that company and that class of claimants McGarrahan's claim is a bona fide one, leaving the United States out. So far as the Government of the United States is concerned, it simply gives McGarrahan his title as it would give it to any other claimant. So that question is disposed of.

Now, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I do not know whether the departmental assembly has affirmed the claim of Gomez. I do not think that it is pertinent to the question. It is in evidence, as I understand from the report, that the archives were taken by the Americans at Monterey and destroyed, so that the proof could not be made. I apprehend, however, that sufficient proof was given before the commission to satisfy that commission that the departmental assembly had confirmed the title, because they especially rejected the claim, not upon the ground which was considered a good and sufficient one at that time, but upon the ground that Gomez had never taken possession. They say that his claim is valid; that he has complied with all the requirements of the law in all things except in the one particular of taking possession. That is evidence to my mind that the claim had been confirmed by the departmental assembly. That is enough to satisfy me on that point.

Then as to the district attorney. The gentleman last on the floor [Mr. VAN WYCK] makes the statement that the district attorney, while in the vindication of the rights of the United States against this claim, corruptly took one half of the claim and confirmed the whole. Now, such a statement does not accord with the facts in the case. Mr. Ord was not district attorney when he made this purchase, but he took one half of the claim, as the evidence discloses, for his attorney fees and other considerations, some four or five years before he became district attorney of the United States. And when he was made district attorney he notified the Attorney General that he was an owner in this claim and could not prosecute it. He therefore requested the appointment of special counsel in the case. The Attorney General was satisfied that Mr. Ord would do right in the matter, and told him to go ahead. He refused to remove him. So Mr. Ord went into court and the judgment was affirmed. Now, sir, there is no corruption about that.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON. One minute more.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to have the previous question seconded, as the hour is about out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to allow me to move to recommit.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the previous question. I will yield to gentlemen after that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will hear me perhaps he will allow my motion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman proposes to recommit.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With instructions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I decline.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman yield me a part of his hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 55, noes 33; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. WILSON, of Iowa, and WASHBURN, of Illinois.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 43.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 475) to extend the charter of Washington city, also to regulate the selection of officers, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 416) for the relief of John S. Cunningham, paymaster United States Navy;

An act (S. No. 358) providing for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander Trevett Abbott, of the United States Navy, to the active list of the Navy;

An act (S. No. 462) making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and other contingent expenses of the Senate for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 126) for the relief of George W. Doty, a commander in the United States Navy on the retired list; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 118) for the appointment of a commission to select suitable locations for powder magazines.

TRADE WITH THE BRITISH PROVINCES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental report on trade with the British North American provinces; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with estimates of appropriations required to carry out treaty stipulations with the Pottawatomie Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

THE SOUTHERN ELECTIONS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the General of the Army, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 12th instant, transmitting the reports of the several district commanders of the recent elections held in the States of Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Louisiana; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is now entitled to the floor for one hour to close the debate on the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me half a minute?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. I simply desire to state that the reasons which I gave in the five minutes allowed me are not the only reasons I have for voting for this bill. The frauds by the New Idria Mining Company and other parties alleged in the report of the committee furnish additional considerations to influence my mind in my action.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, resumed the floor.

Mr. HIGBY. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I would like, in the course of his hour, to have fifteen minutes, if he will let me.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will do so now.

Mr. HIGBY. I would prefer to hear the gentleman speak first.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well. Mr. Speaker, this report has been attacked as one involving a great fraud. I have, in reply to that charge, to say that the Committee on the Judiciary have examined this case with great care and at great length. If there is a feature of the case on either side thereof which has not been brought to the attention of the committee the fault lies with the parties contesting for this property.

Patiently and for days the committee listened to the proofs and arguments presented by the claimant in whose favor this report is made, and by a party unknown to the record of the case in the courts, who has pursued this claimant relentlessly during the past twelve or thirteen years. The report proposes no new steps in legislation. It does not look to the establishment of a new precedent. It does not ask the House to sit as a court of review upon the decisions of the Supreme Court. Nothing of the kind is involved in this case. If the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] who brings this charge of fraud, had examined the report of the committee, he would have found five cases of precedents there referred to, to wit: 1. The Soscol act, 12 United States Statutes, page 808; 2. The Bolso de Jornales act, 13 United States Statutes, page 136; 3. Ex-Mission San José act, 13 United States Statutes, page 534; 4. Laguna de Santos Calle act, 13 United States Statutes, page 372; and 5. Baron de Bastrop act, 9 United States Statutes, page 597.

Those precedents involve the same principle upon which this bill is based, though the character of each particular case may vary somewhat from this one.

Now, sir, having found the precedents, I wish to call the attention of the House to the nature and character of this case; and I may here say that in passing upon this case the committee and the House are entitled to exercise those broad principles of equity which would lift this proceeding out of the narrow rule which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has quoted from the decisions of the Supreme Court, even though he had correctly understood those decisions. But, sir, I undertake to say that in the case to which he referred, which carried this contest into the Supreme Court of the United States, there was no consideration of the real merits of the case as they were presented to the committee, nor has there been in any other proceeding in the Supreme Court.

I wish now briefly to pass over the history of the case. Vincent P. Gomez claimed that he had received a grant of lands from the Mexican Government four square leagues in extent, and after the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by which the United States was bound to protect such rights and interests, and after the passage of the act of 1851 establishing the board of land commissioners in California, he presented his petition for an adjustment of his claim and a confirmation of his grant.

The board of land commissioners decided that he had produced evidence sufficient to prove the existence and validity of the grant; but, inasmuch as he had not proved occupancy, they rejected his petition and refused to confirm the grant. Now, let it be remembered that, so far as the genuineness of the grant was concerned the board of land commissioners did not challenge it, and only held adversely to the prayer of the claimant's petition on the technical question of possession.

During these proceedings one Pacificus Ord was the attorney for the claimant Gomez.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My question is this: suppose the board of commissioners had ratified the claim of Gomez; was it not competent to appeal from their decision to the Supreme Court of the United States and have it reversed, if possible?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Undoubtedly, first appealing to the district court.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very good. Then the whole thing in regard to this matter as to the absence of occupancy being taken into consideration by the board was all presented to the consideration of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman has examined this case he knows just as well as I do, without asking the question, that an appeal would lie. As I was saying when interrupted at that point of this case, Pacificus Ord was an attorney for Gomez. Some time afterward, and during the same year, Ord was appointed United States district attorney for the southern district of California. The then claimant, Gomez, appealed to the district court of the United States, not because the land commissioners had decided his grant to be invalid, but because they had decided that it was necessary for him to prove occupancy. Upon that state of record and finding of the commissioners the case went into the district court of the United States.

In the proceedings had in the United States district court we find the commencement of this charge of fraud against this claim. Now, what are the facts? It is in proof in the case—it is in proof in the very case the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] has read from, but from which he did not read the explanatory affidavit of Ord—that Ord notified the Attorney General of the United States of his interest in certain land cases in California, and requested him to select special counsel to take charge of the interests of the Government. The Attorney General paid no attention to this notification. The case came on for hearing. After having waited for the Attorney General to act, and he having neglected to act, Ord himself procured another attorney to appear in the case. When the case was called, the Supreme Court of the United States having in the meantime decided in the Fremont case that occupancy was not necessary to the establishment of the validity of a grant, Ord said that he knew of no objection to the confirmation of the grant. The board of land commissioners had approved of the validity of the grant, and only ruled Gomez out on the question of occupancy. There was no fraud in this, as it seems to the committee; for it was in harmony with what we consider, after careful examination, the legal rights of the party claimant.

But it is said, in the opinion of the Supreme Court referred to, that Ord had received his share of this land covered by this claim for the nominal consideration of one dollar. It is true that is the consideration stated in the conveyance. But the real consideration was the services of Ord, as attorney for Gomez, in presenting the case before the board of land commissioners prior to the time that he was appointed United States district attorney. It may be said that one half of the land was a very large fee for the service rendered. But it must be remembered that it was not then known that this land embodied any mineral deposits whatever, and was regarded as of very little value. The great body of land was regarded as worthless, and one half of it was sold for the beggarly sum of $1,000; so that in the worst feature of the case Ord really received, in payment for his services, an interest which he might chance to sell for $1,000, but which had no fixed value, for attending to the case before the land commissioners, not a very large sum, I apprehend, to be paid for such services in California at that time. It was upon this action of Ord—of which, by the way, it seems, this present claimant, McGarrahan, knew nothing whatever—that this case turned in the Supreme Court of the United States, and not on the merits of the case. The real merits of the case have not been there, nor has the great body of the testimony presented before the Committee on the Judiciary been in the Supreme Court or any other court of the United States, or before the board of land commissioners.

Mr. TAFFE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. TAFFE. There seems to be some confusion about this case. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] said something several times about a "patent." It seems to be well settled that a patent cannot be attached in an action of ejectment. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to say that the equity of this case has never been passed upon. I would like, for my part, to know about that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This case, Mr. Speaker, is not an attack upon a patent. The United States have never issued any patent in the case at all. A patent was once prepared, but its execution was stopped in a peculiar manner, as was explained in the hearing before the committee.

Now, as I have stated, the great body of the evidence presented to the Committee on the Judiciary has never been in any court whatever; and when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] undertakes to say, reading from Judge Hoffman's opinion in the case referred to in Hoffman's Reports, that Gomez has there been impeached, and that Abrigo stands in the same situation, and that this case rests upon no other testimony, it only shows that the gentleman was right when he stated that it has been so long since he investigated the case that many of the facts have passed from his mind. For Gomez has not testified at all; Abrigo testified before the land commissioner; but we have in the case the evidence of some six or eight witnesses who testify to a group of facts and circumstances which make the case stronger than it was while resting on Abrigo's testimony. Some of these witnesses swear to the perfection of the grant, and to having seen it before it was finally filed among the archives, which were, it is alleged, destroyed. Several witnesses testify to the fact of having seen the papers and that Gomez had the grant.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to suggest another point. It doubtless has not escaped the gentleman's attention, but I have not heard him mention it. It appears by the affidavit of J. Marno Bonilla, secretary of the superior tribunal of justice in Monterey, that Gomez, in 1844, applied to him for stamped paper, to be used in procuring a title to lands; and that in 1845 he saw memoranda of grants of land, among which was that of Panoche Grande to Gomez.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is referred to in the report as one of the evidences of the genuineness of this grant.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And other grants founded upon this grant are found among the records.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It appears from the testimony presented before the committee that in two grants, one of which, certainly, has been confirmed, the Panoche Grande is referred to as their boundary, and the Panoche Grande refers to them as one of its boundaries.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And those grants have been confirmed?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. At least one of them. I do not recollect as to the other.

After the confirmation of this grant by the district court, McGarrahan purchased, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, the title from Gomez. Ord held an interest in it; but McGarrahan, who was warred against by the New Idria Mining Company in the name of the United States, and was put to great expense, paying all the outlay himself, finally required Ord to transfer to him his interest by way of remunerating McGarrahan for what he had expended, and now holds and owns the entire title.

I have said that the party warring against McGarrahan was the New Idria Mining Company, a party not known to the record in any of the tribunals before which this case has been tried until it reached the Judiciary Committee. Before the committee the New Idria Mining Company appeared as the real party, filing its memorial; and from this memorial I have incorporated into the report the following paragraph:

"The real parties who contested the grant were your memorialists, for against them only were the efforts of the owners of the Panoche Grande rancho directed. For the New Idria mines, and for the fruits of the labor of those who have developed them, the owners of the Panoche Grande are now seeking congressional interference in their behalf. It may well be doubted whether the Panoche Grande would ever have been heard of in the district court of the United States or in Congress but for the hope of robbing your memorialists of the fruits of their years of labor and vast expenditures of money."

Here we find first developed upon the record the real party who, in the name of the United States, has been resisting the claim of McGarrahan; and, as is stated in the report of the committee, that hidden party has used the officers of the United States, the tribunals of the United States, and the money of the United States to crush this man, to whom, as the committee believe, this property should pass, even without the payment of any money at all, under the obligations imposed upon us by the treaty of Gaudaloupe Hidalgo.

Mr. PRUYN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask why, then, do the committee propose to require this man to pay $1 25 per acre for the land?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state the reason. The claimant asked to be permitted, in pursuance of precedents heretofore established by Congress, to purchase the land; and the committee thought this arrangement proper enough, inasmuch as it avoids completely the position assumed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] that we are attempting to review and reverse the decisions of the Supreme Court. We say, notwithstanding the decisions of the court on this case as imperfectly presented, we will not put Congress in the position of reversing one of its decisions; and, therefore, in view of the great equities of the case, we propose to permit this party to come in and purchase at $1 25 per acre the land embraced in this grant, thus doing at least partial justice, and avoiding every appearance of attempting to reverse the decisions of the court.

Now, sir, I have no doubt, as I have stated—and I do not think there is a doubt in the minds of six other members of the Judiciary Committee—that under the treaty of Gaudaloupe Hidalgo this claimant is entitled to this property.

Mr. PRUYN. Without $1 25 per acre?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Without $1 25 per acre; but we have recommended the relief presented by the report for the reasons therein stated.

I propose, inasmuch as we have got rid of these parties to the record of the Supreme Court of the United States, to call attention of the House to the testimony with regard to the case quoted by my colleague on the committee from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] He says the Supreme Court laid down a rule by which every party claiming under these Mexican grants must prove by record testimony his entire chain of title. I do not go understand it; but if it be so ruled by the court it is no rule for us to follow; for who ever heard of a rule being so respected which deprives a party, after he has explained the absence of primary evidence and his inability to produce it, the privilege of substituting the next best? and that is what he has done in this case; but his case does not rest entirely on the testimony outside of the record. He has presented from the Spanish archives, duly certified by the keeper of the archives, the original petition for this grant; the direction of the Governor that the necessary investigation be made; the report of the officer to whom that was directed to make investigation; the report of the officer having charge of the land department that there were no reasons why the grant should not be made. This all comes from the Spanish archives now in the keeping of the United States; and the remaining papers of the title were, it is alleged, destroyed when a great portion of the archives were destroyed by the troops of the United States when they took possession of Monterey. Therefore he has given the best secondary evidence he can command, and proves by several witnesses that the grant was complete; that they had seen the grant; that Gomez had once mortgaged the grant to one of the witnesses for a certain sum of money, and that it was finally placed in the archives at Monterey, and presumed to have been destroyed when the greater part of the archives at Monterey were destroyed by our Army, as I have already stated.

That is, in brief, the evidence upon which the claimant rests his case. No matter how bad Gomez is now; no matter how improperly Ord may have acted; if Ord acted fraudulently and Gomez was a rascal, if the grant was made as alleged, and this claimant has acted honestly, he is entitled to the property.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that no one disputes the archives were destroyed by fire.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. So I understand. And furthermore, I may say in that connection, that one of the counsel for the New Idria Mining Company, who had been attorney for years in this contest, was introduced before the Committee on the Judiciary, and he testified that he believed the petition of Gomez was a genuine document, and that he based his opinion on his knowledge of the facts and circumstances connected with the case of said Gomez against the United States, which involved the validity of the grant upon which this case is based. That is the statement of a gentleman, under oath, who had experience of years, himself attorney on behalf of the contesting party.

I will not occupy the time of the House in going over all the circumstances of this case. It is a most remarkable case; one that is full of romance, I might say, from beginning to end. I have never in all my experience known a party, single-handed and alone, so persistently to assert his rights in opposition to what seemed to be a combination between the United States and this quicksilver monopoly, the interest controlling the production of quicksilver on the Pacific coast. It appears in the testimony and statements made before the committee that one of the great reasons why the New Idria Mining Company has been so persistent in its attempts to control this property was that they had made an arrangement with other parties by which all the quicksilver produced in California should be controlled by the parties to the arrangement. And in this they have been successful. And now that that arrangement is about expiring, I am informed another has been or is about to be entered into by which this scheme shall be carried on in the future, so that monopolists, if they succeed in defeating this claim and in getting possession of the property under their claim filed in the land office of California, will control indefinitely the product of quicksilver and its price.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. I understand by the report that the committee find that the title to this land is in the Government of the United States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HIGBY. Well, then, why not let the Government of the United States control it, if it is so valuable?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will tell the gentleman why. Under the act of 1866 it was provided that persons may enter mineral lands at the rate of five dollars per acre. This New Idria Company is made up of sundry individuals. They have filed, according to representations made to the committee, claims to this land under that act, covering three thousand feet of the quicksilver lode, and, as we were informed, embracing nineteen hundred acres of land. Now, how did they do that? The mining company is an artificial person—but one person—and under the act of 1866 would be entitled to only two hundred feet of that lode, and a small amount of land adjoining. But it seems they have divided this artificial person into as many persons as there are stockholders in the corporation, and have filed their separate claims upon this land, seeking in this way to get possession of three thousand feet instead of two hundred.

Now, under this proceeding of the New Idria Mining Company, if they should succeed in getting possession of what they are claiming, the Government of the United States would receive $9,500 from all that valuable property, while under the bill we have reported from the committee on behalf of the claimant, the United States would receive $23,040. The corporation of the New Idria Mining Company have taken all the mineral land and added thereto a few hundred acres of the adjacent lands, leaving all the worthless portion of the tract embraced in the boundaries of the grant for the Government to dispose of as it can, while McGarrahan comes in and proposes to take the entire body, which gives the United States more than double what it would receive from the mining company contesting this grant. Defeat this bill and no benefit results to the Government, for under existing laws the stockholders of the mining company would demand land under the claims by them filed in spite of any repealing acts you may pass. In no event can a defeat of this bill inure to the benefit of the Government.

Another thing. These parties have complained that they have expended large sums of money, and great injury will be done them if this bill passes. Sir, the sworn statement of one of the principal stockholders, Mr. Mills, of the Bank of California, an institution which is backing up this fight with its five millions of capital, is that out of the product of that mine this company had now more than paid all of its expenditures. They have taken a large amount of mineral from this mine, worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, covering all expenses, and leaving a balance of profit to the company. The enterprise required them to make some advances in the first instance; but after the mine was put in active operation they paid all expenses out of the product of the mine, and, as the gentleman referred to testified, if a balance were now to be struck it would be found in favor of the company. They have had their profit for nothing and have no just grounds of complaint against this bill.

I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing in regard to the details of this struggle between two sets of claimants to the tract of land here in question. Yet, sir, knowing something in regard to the character of titles that were once involved in this land question, knowing the many great and grievous evils that have grown out of it in our State, I feel a great interest so far as the public is concerned, this Government, and the government of my own State. So far as the contestants with McGarrahan are concerned, how many they are, who they are, how great their wealth is, I know nothing about it, except what may appear in a pamphlet that has been laid on my desk—by whom I do not know, but I presume it came from some one in the interest of this New Idria Mining Company.

But, sir, I understand this bill to be in its purport this: that after there has been a struggle to make this Mexican grant title to the lands good in the courts, which has failed, an opportunity shall be given to this man McGarrahan to assume the same rights there which he would have under the Mexican title that was conveyed to him by Gomez. That I understand to be the purport and intent of this bill. Pass it and he can go on to this grant, as it is alleged to be, and go anywhere within its exterior bounds, whether it includes twenty or five hundred leagues, and locate his four leagues of land.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to correct the gentleman in that regard. The bill provides that this claimant shall be entitled to purchase the land which is embraced within the limits of the survey under the grant now on file in the General Land Office.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, that survey was made in accordance with the terms of the old Mexican grants. The whole thing has been done with reference to that survey. The location of this piece of land has been made under the rules established by the court with reference to Mexican titles, and that is to go anywhere within the exterior bounds of the grant, no matter whether it be forty, fifty, five hundred, or a thousand leagues, and locate the two, three, or four leagues, and this very location has been made in accordance with those rules established by the court. It is true that under this bill he is to have the four leagues as surveyed, but they were surveyed under the rules established. And this land was located, as I learn from the committee and from the papers, where this New Idria mine is, which is worth, I know not how much; some say $1,000,000, some $500,000, and others $100,000. I have never been there, and know nothing about it except what I pick up from outside information. I presume the committee have more information on that subject than I have.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the position of this case. Pass this bill, and you perpetuate that very system which has been the curse of our State. I hope there never will be any legislation in this body that will perpetuate one single case of that kind.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman from California whether he understands that under this bill any additional survey can be made?

Mr. HIGBY. No, sir; and I do not care whether it can. I say the survey has been made according to these rules, and this bill is to settle the question and let this man go and take his land where it was surveyed under the old system of the Mexican grant. He has located it. He located it while they were contesting in the courts; he located it before they went into court, and the object of this bill is to give him that land thus located. There was a great deal of land within the exterior bounds of this grant, but he selected this land and went into court and failed to get it.

The report of the committee refers to five or six cases which are cited as analogous cases. I wish to call the attention of the House to certain of the cases they have cited and to show the difference between these cases and this case. I have a positive knowledge as to three of them and of the passage of the bills through Congress. I have knowledge as to the facts in another case from outside information, for the law was passed before I became a member of Congress.

The Socol case has been cited. Now, I wish, before I say anything in regard to that, to have the Clerk read the extract which I have marked, from one of the decisions in that case of the United States vs. Gomez.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Regarding the case as regularly before the court, it becomes necessary to examine the merits of the claim. Some suspicion attaches to the claim because it is made for four leagues of land, whereas the only document introduced in support of it, which is of the least probative force, represents the original claimant as having asked for but three leagues. Document referred to purports to be the petition of the claimant to the Governor, and there is appended to it the usual informe; but there is no concession or grant, nor is there any satisfactory evidence that any title of any kind was ever issued by the Governor to the claimant. He states in his petition to the land commissioners that he obtained the map in the record from the proper officers of the department; but the alleged fact is not satisfactorily proved.

"Four witnesses were examined by the claimant before the land commissioners, but only one of the number pretended that he had ever seen the grant, and his statements are quite too indefinite to be received as satisfactory proof. Instead of proving possession, under the grant, it is satisfactorily shown that he never occupied it at all; and it is doubtful if he ever saw the premises during the Mexican rule. Land commissioners rejected the claim, but before it came up for hearing in the district court his attorney had been appointed district attorney of the United States, and the proofs show that he conveyed two leagues of the land to the district attorney. Circumstances of the confirmation of the claim in the district court are fully stated in the opinion of this court, given when the mandate was revoked and recalled. Comment upon those circumstances is unnecessary, except to say that the confirmation was fraudulently obtained."

Mr. HIGBY. That opinion of the Supreme Court in this very case shows conclusively that this Gomez was never in possession of this tract of land, and probably never saw it under the Mexican rule.

Now, in the Socol case the parties who came here had bought what they supposed was the Mexican title, and some of them had been in possession of the title for twelve or fifteen years, and had established an extended business and had their buildings on the land. That is the difference between this case of Gomez, who, according to the opinion of the court, had never been in possession of and probably never had seen this land, and the parties in the Socol case.

Now, in reference to the other case referred to, there were parties who had been for years in possession of the Mexican title, and there was no contestant whatever. I got that case through Congress myself. The proof was undoubted; there was no contestant. The Government of the United States let the parties in possession have the land upon entering it and paying the Government price. Such were the facts in regard to those three cases; so that the parallel does not run through the cases of this character brought in here.

I must say, as was said by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa,] that this is an extraordinary case. I cannot say a word to impeach the character of that committee, whose members embrace some of the best members of this House. But it does seem to me that they have failed to get hold of some things which they ought to have understood before they presented this bill to the House and asked Congress to perpetuate this system. I hope that this House will assist in no such measure. I would have been glad if we never had had one of those claims, for they have already done us incalculable injury.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HIGBY. I will, certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] to place his objection to this claim not upon the injustice of the claim, but upon the injustice of the system. Now, I ask the gentleman if this is not a parallel case with those to which he has referred, and if in those cases we did not in like manner perpetuate the system of which he complains?

Mr. HIGBY. No, sir; this is a very different case. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has said that these parties of the New Idria Mining Company have located mining claims upon this land. Well, sir, if they have gone there under the mineral-land law which we passed three years ago what will be the consequence if we pass this bill? Will they not come to Congress and say you have given away to others land which under the mineral land law you authorized us to take, and ask for compensation?

The gentleman says the Government will get more money into its Treasury by permitting McGarrahan to take this land at $1 25 an acre than by letting the New Idria Mining Company have it at five dollars an acre. It seems to me that if they will give us five dollars an acre, that will be more than the Government would get otherwise. Now, I apprehend that besides the danger of perpetuating this system there is danger that some party will ask indemnity of the Government if this bill is passed. It has been shown conclusively that this Government has given in one case a patent for one hundred and sixty acres of land. Now, I think I will be able to show by evidence that such is the condition of things that this Government will be called upon to make indemnity to some one or other if this bill is passed. I think we will be in better condition if we do not pass this bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As to the matter of survey, my information is that it was made under the act of May 30, 1862, an act to reduce the expenses of surveys and sales of the public lands of the United States. That is the law under which I understand this survey to have been made, and not, as the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] says, under the old Spanish rule. But no matter under what regulations this survey was made, they were the regulations controlling and governing all such cases in the United States. The parties were required to locate their surveys within exterior boundaries of the grant and in a compact body, which has been done in this case.

Now, a word in reply to one other remark of the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY,] that there is no parallel between this case and the Socol case. Why, sir, I did not introduce that for the purpose of claiming that this case is precisely like that, but for the purpose of showing that the principle involved in this bill has been acted upon heretofore. That is all there is of it. The precedent, so far as the principle is concerned, is pertinent.

Now, the gentleman from California says he does not know by what motive the committee has been controlled.

Mr. HIGBY. No, sir. I did not say that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The motive by which the committee has been controlled is the desire to do exact justice in this case. And when the gentleman says that there are some facts which the committee ought to have known, I repeat what I have said before that, if there is a single fact connected with this case that has not come to the knowledge of the committee, it is the fault of the parties contending for this property—they had ample opportunity to place everything before the committee, and I have no doubt they did so.

Mr. HIGBY. I did not wish to cast any reflection upon the committee, but I think there are other facts in this case which, if they had been properly presented, would have induced the committee to come to a different conclusion.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. WARD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this is not really a controversy between private parties; and if that be so, why is the matter brought here? Why not leave the parties to their remedy at law?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman. The United States is somewhat involved in this controversy. The person claiming under that grant insists that he has not had his rights protected under the treaty between the United States and Mexico; that the United States have failed in this case to carry out their obligations under that treaty; and although the matter has, as is alleged, been in the Supreme Court, the committee affirm that the case has not been there upon its real merits, and as fully as it was presented to the committee. The claimant, therefore, asks that by this mode of proceeding the United States shall fulfill their obligations under the treaty, avoiding the appearance of an attempt to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court by permitting him to have the preference in the purchase of that property.

Mr. WARD. Then are we to understand that this is a mode of reviewing the action of the Supreme Court?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, sir, cannot the gentleman understand my language? I have expressly said that it is not a mode of reviewing the decision of the Supreme Court, and that for the purpose of avoiding the appearance of any such thing, we have recommended, in view of the equities in favor of the party, that he be allowed to purchase the land, the title of which is now in the United States, but which we believe ought to be in this claimant.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allotted to me it is impossible for me to review the evidence bearing upon this case; but the gentlemen who are opposing the measure now before the House manifestly do so because they do not know anything about the peculiar facts of the case or the principles involved in the bill.

By this bill the United States does not grant and will not lose one cent. The United States will, in fact, get more money from this man McGarrahan than it would from this combination of capitalists, who have for six, eight, or ten years been keeping him out of the property to which he is, if not legally, beyond all question equitably entitled.

This matter has been before the Committee on the Judiciary, who have examined it very carefully and at great length. Those who are interested in the defeat of the measure now before the House are made up of a body of capitalists controlling hundreds of thousands of dollars. They have come before that committee; they have had a hearing. They have brought their counsel there; they have produced their evidence. They have brought before that committee every fact that they deemed of importance to invalidate the claim of McGarrahan; and the deliberate conviction to which the committee has arrived is that McGarrahan, if not entitled to this land absolutely and legally, has such an equitable claim to it that it would be a great wrong on the part of the United States Government not to concede to him a right of preemption; and that is all that is claimed by the measure now before the House.

Suppose we refuse this, what is the result? Under the claim set up under existing law these capitalists who have taken possession of this land of Mr. McGarrahan and used all the means which they could bring to bear for the purpose of defeating his title in the courts, will have the right to enter that land and secure the title to all thereof that is of any value, and that, too, without paying much more than one half what Mr. McGarrahan will pay for the land under the provisions of this bill and we are not giving away one single acre. We are not giving away anything. We are not granting anything. We are only giving a right of preemption to a man whom the Judiciary Committee believe has already an equitable title thereto, and which would have been confirmed years ago if it had not been for the extraordinary efforts made by a combination of capitalists who have succeeded in defeating the claim of an honest and meritorious citizen, who in fact never would have had any difficulty in procuring his patent to said lands if valuable mineral deposits had not been discovered thereon after the title had been acquired by McGarrahan.

This is the secret of the whole opposition to the confirmation of the title of this man McGarrahan, who, solitary and alone, without backing, for years has been prosecuting a right that, in my judgment, ought to be confirmed. The legal question has indeed been decided against him on technicalities, and the title is now in the Government of the United States; but, inasmuch as the equity is unquestionably in him, we merely, without impugning the action of the courts, propose to give him the right to purchase and acquire title to the land.

Mr. HIGBY. Allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MARSHALL. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. Does not the court decide that the grant was fraudulently obtained?

Mr. MARSHALL. That has been explained by the chairman of the committee; and if the gentleman from California had given any attention to the question he would have known, if he had examined the facts bearing on this question, that the decision of the court cannot have any rightful bearing upon the matter now under consideration before the House.

Mr. HIGBY rose.

Mr. MARSHALL. I cannot yield further, as I have only five minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. Only for a question. Does the gentleman mean to say that the court did not give attention to it?

Mr. MARSHALL. I do mean to say that there has been no charge, and there can be no charge, of fraud upon the part of Mr. McGarrahan. It has been conceded by the lawyer, Judge Gould, who has been employed on the part of the New Idria Mining Company, that there is no doubt about the genuineness of this Gomez grant.

Mr. VAN WYCK rose.

Mr. MARSHALL. I cannot yield; I have not the time. It is impossible that gentlemen understand this case, or they would not make opposition to it. McGarrahan has never been charged with fraud.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. McGarrahan has never been charged by any one with fraud. He bought this land in good faith after the title of Gomez was confirmed by the decree of the proper tribunal under the laws of the United States. He bought it without notice of any contest or dispute in regard to the validity of the title; but these monopolists took possession of his land and set up, in the name of the United States, a claim which has been litigated for years. McGarrahan will now have to pay for this land to obtain a title, the title which we believe he ought to have had confirmed long ago. And, as I have already said, he would have long since have had the title if it had not been for the extraordinary efforts made to defeat it by men possessing unlimited means, who have pursued him for years. The Government will lose nothing, for it must go to one or the other, and all the equities are with McGarrahan.

And, sir, I am not surprised at the opposition to the measure now before the House. I do not question the integrity of a single gentleman who is opposing the measure here; but it would be most extraordinary if men commanding the influence, the talents, and capital that these men do, could not by printed, partial, or garbled statements of facts, or other means, bring forward plausible arguments to influence the minds of gentlemen who have not had an opportunity to examine this question thoroughly, and make them believe that the claim of McGarrahan is without any just foundation. And for the manner in which he has been pursued before the courts, Legislatures, and everywhere, it would be strange, indeed, if they did not succeed in misleading even the most intelligent members of the House who have not had an opportunity of examining the question in all its bearings.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand the gentleman in his remarks to reflect upon gentlemen on this floor who have opposed this claim as though they were representatives of the New Idria Mining Company.

Mr. MARSHALL. Oh, not at all.

Mr. BOUTWELL. For myself, I have had no intercourse with them except what I have had in the committee. The gentleman has no right to impugn the action of those who oppose this claim.

Mr. MARSHALL. I am very sorry the gentleman understood me so to do. I certainly intended nothing of the kind.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think I do not misunderstand the force of language.

Mr. HIGBY. Whom does the gentleman mean, if not the member from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARSHALL. In what, sir?

Mr. HIGBY. In speaking about commanding their forces.

Mr. MARSHALL. I said it would be most extraordinary if men of influence should not make an impression on the minds of honest and intelligent gentlemen, and make them believe that there are reasons why this measure should not be passed. I did not intend—and if I was so understood I now entirely disavow it—to cast any reflection upon any gentleman who opposes this measure. I did not think anything of the kind.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I accept the gentleman's explanation, but in consequence of his remarks I wish only to say this: I have received a letter from Mr. Shepherd asking that the matter might be recommitted to the committee, which I am perfectly willing the gentleman or any one else should read. Two gentlemen outside of the committee-room have spoken to me upon this matter and I declined to hear their statement. In the statements I have made and the course I have taken I have been governed wholly by my convictions of duty, based upon the testimony taken before the committee.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I would be the last man on this floor that would either directly or indirectly wantonly impugn the motives of my brother members upon this floor, and especially of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Mr. BOUTWELL,] for whom I have personally a very high regard. Not the slightest idea of improper motives on the part of members has crossed my mind. All I intended to say was that it would be extraordinary if these gentlemen who have been fighting this claimant through the courts of the United States for years could not bring some facts and arguments to bear that would influence honest and intelligent gentlemen who had not thoroughly examined the case to oppose the measure before this House. That is what I said, and I do not think my language or my purpose in using it can be misunderstood. I should regret to see the case recommitted. It would be doing great injustice to McGarran to give it that direction. The committee have already given weeks to its investigation. They have patiently listened to all parties interested, and heard all the evidence they thought proper to submit. There is not the slightest probability that the case will ever be better understood than it is at this time. Members not of the committee cannot and will not give it a thorough investigation. The report is before the House; and if we are determined to refuse this man this simple act of justice he had better know his fate at this time. Delay can do no good to any one.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that every member of the committee and of the House has endeavored to consider this question fairly and in accordance with its merits, and it resolves itself into this: shall the Government of the United States observe its treaty obligations, protect the rights of property involved under this grant, and permit this claimant, who has been reduced from affluence to poverty in this fight, to get that which justly belongs to him, or whether it shall permit this valuable property to pass into the hands of persons who are organized and known as the New Idria Mining Company, thereby receiving less from it than it will receive from this claimant, and thereby perpetuating a completely close monopoly of the production of this mineral on this continent. That is the simple question. That the title is a good one I do not doubt. That the title is a good one the other members of the committee concurring in this report do not doubt. The question, I repeat, reduces itself to this: whether this Government will protect its citizens, observe its obligations under the treaty, and give to this man the poor privilege at least of purchasing land which of right belongs to him. I have no more to say.

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted on the bill.

Mr. HIGBY. Is it in order to move that the bill be recommitted?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question has been operating for the past hour. The question is on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is it not in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded for the purpose of moving to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee to report a bill repealing all laws permitting these mineral lands to be purchased at five dollars an acre?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is in order, and if carried will divest the bill of the operation of the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it in order to say that we reconsider for the purpose of making a general rule to operate on all cases?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to make that statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, who is hostile to the bill in its present shape, moves to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and if that motion be carried he will then be entitled to the floor, under the usage of the House, to make the motion which he has indicated, to recommit the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope it will not be reconsidered for any such purpose.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will withdraw the motion to reconsider, and ask the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put.

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I insist on my motion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No; I want to recommit the bill and save this amount of land to the Government.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. You cannot do it in that way, because it will fall directly into the hands of the other party, the New Idria Company.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to—yeas 56, nays 42.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 73, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beatty, Benjamin, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cullom, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Higby, Hopkins, Hunter, Judd, Kelsey, Ketchum, Lincoln, Logan, Maynard, McCarthy, Moore, Nunn, Paine, Perham, Plants, Polsley, Raun, Sawyer, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Stephen F. Wilson—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Beaman, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Harding, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loughbridge, Marshall, Marvin, McCormick, McCullough, Morgan, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Twichell, Van Auker, Van Trump, James F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Woodward—73.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Benton, Butler, Cary, Churchill, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Eckley, Eggleston, Finney, Fox, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, George V. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Wood—61.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 49, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Beaman, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loughbridge, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, Morgan, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Pile, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Aaron F. Trimble, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—62.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a few moments?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Certainly.

EXTRA COPIES OF TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. Many gentlemen have been inquiring about the extra copies of the internal tax bill. I am enabled to inform the House that the bill, in bill form, is now ready for delivery to members; probably it has already been laid upon the tables of members. But the Government Printer says he will not be able to furnish the five thousand additional copies (which are to be published in pamphlet form for convenience of distribution) until next Monday. In the mean time I will ask unanimous consent of the House, if that can be obtained—and if not I will ask to have the motion referred to the Committee on Printing—to have five hundred additional copies, beyond the five thousand already ordered, published in pamphlet form for distribution by members of the Committee of Ways and Means. Under the present order the members of that committee will receive no more copies than other members of the House, while they receive hundreds of applications for them. I have received, yesterday and to-day, as many as sixty applications for copies. I therefore move that while the Government Printer is printing the five thousand copies in pamphlet form for the use of the House he be ordered to print five hundred additional copies for the use of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent five hundred copies of the five thousand already ordered can be given to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Objection was made by several members.

Mr. SCHENCK. We do not ask to have these five hundred copies taken from the copies already ordered for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. Any additional order for printing extra copies must go to the Committee on Printing under the law.

The motion to print five hundred additional copies of the internal tax bill was accordingly referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee can be prepared to report on that matter to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. It is possible that at twelve o'clock to-morrow, when the House meets, our presence may be desired at the bar of the Senate. That would, perhaps, prevent action at that time upon this resolution.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire to inquire whether any business will be done to-day after we come out of Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. No business will be transacted, unless the Committee on Printing shall be ready to report upon the resolution to print five hundred additional copies of the internal tax bill in pamphlet form.

LAW DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary House bill No. 765, to establish a law department, together with a substitute; which substitute was ordered to be printed, and with the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IRON-CLADS ONEOTA AND CATAWBA.

Mr. BENJAMIN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House copies of all correspondence that has taken place between the Navy Department and any other parties in relation to the sale of the iron-clads Oneota and Catawba.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will not the gentleman modify the resolution so as to include also an inquiry with regard to the sale of the Illinois?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That inquiry would more properly be addressed to the Secretary of War.

Mr. ROBINSON. In view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, I will not insist on the modification.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to know what is the object of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] in offering the resolution?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Committee on Retrenchment has been charged with the investigation of the sale of these iron-clads. Some correspondence on the subject has been had between certain parties and the Navy Department. We want to get that correspondence. This resolution is offered for that purpose at the instance of the Committee on Retrenchment.

The resolution was adopted.

TRADE WITH BRITISH PROVINCES, ETC.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That forty-five hundred extra copies of the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated March 30 (Ex. Doc. No. 240) and May 14, 1868, together with the reports of Mr. George W. Brega upon trade with the British Provinces of North America, therewith transmitted, be printed for the use of the House, and five hundred for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think this resolution ought not to pass, but I will not object to its reference to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

HARRIS STEAM ENGINE COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1074) to incorporate the Harris Steam Engine Company of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

IMPROVEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. ELA, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire whether any further appropriation is necessary to cause the removal of the half dozen loads of rubbish which have lain for the last fifteen months about the west front of the Capitol, and to complete the grading now suspended, requiring about twenty days' labor.

PRINTING OF INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed in pamphlet form five hundred copies of the bill "to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes," reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, for the use of the committee.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MCCARTHY asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence after to-day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, in the chair.)

FINANCIAL POLICY OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am aware that financial subjects are dull and uninviting in comparison with those heroic themes which have absorbed the attention of Congress for the last five years. To turn from the consideration of armies and navies, victories and defeats, to the long array of figures which exhibit the debt, expenditure, taxation, and industry of the nation, requires no little courage and self-denial; but to those questions we must come, and to their solution Congresses, political parties, and all thoughtful citizens must give their best efforts for many years to come. Our public debt, the greatest financial fact of this century, stands in the pathway of all political parties and, like the Egyptian Sphinx, propounds its riddles. All the questions which spring out of the public debt, such as loans, bonds, tariffs, internal taxation, banking, and currency, present greater difficulties than usually come within the scope of American politics. They cannot be settled by force of numbers nor carried by assault, as an army storms the works of an enemy. Patient examination of facts, careful study of principles which do not always appear on the surface, and which involve the most difficult problems of political economy, are the weapons of this warfare. No sentiment of national pride should make us unmindful of the fact that we have less experience in this direction than any other civilized nation. If this fact is not creditable to our intellectual reputation, it at least affords a proof that our people have not hitherto been crushed under the burdens of taxation. We must consent to be instructed by the experience of other nations, and be willing to approach these questions, not with the dogmatism of teachers, but as seekers after truth.

It is evident, that both in Congress and among the people, there is great diversity of opinion on all these themes. He is indeed a bold man who, at this time, claims to have mastered any one of them, or reached conclusions on all its features satisfactory even to himself. For myself, I claim only to have studied earnestly to know what the best interests of the country demand at the hands of Congress. I have listened with great respect to the opinions of those with whom I differ most, and only ask for myself what I award to all others, a patient hearing.

THE HARD TIMES.

The past six months have been remarkable for unparalleled distress in the commercial and industrial interests of half the civilized world. In Great Britain, the distress among the laboring classes is more terrible than the people of those islands have suffered for a quarter of a century. From every city, town, and village in the kingdom, the cry of distress comes up through every issue of the press. The London Times of December 11, says:

"Last winter the demands on the public were unprecedented. The amount of money given to the poor of London beyond that disbursed in legal relief of the poor, was almost incredible. It seemed the demand had reached its highest point, but if we are not mistaken the exigencies of the present season will surpass those of any former year in British history."

The London Star, of a still later date, says:

"Men and women die in our streets every day of starvation. Whole districts are sinking into one vast, squalid, awful condition of helpless, hopeless destitution."

From many parts of continental Europe there comes a similar cry. A few weeks since the Secretary of State laid before this body a letter from the American minister at Copenhagen, appealing to this country for contributions for the relief of the suffering poor of Sweden and Norway. A late Berlin paper says "business is at a stand-still, and privation and suffering are everywhere seen." The inhabitants of eastern Prussia are appealing to the German citizens of the United States for immediate relief. In Russia the horrors of pestilence are added to the sufferings of famine. In Finland the peasants are dying of starvation by hundreds. In some parts of France and Spain the scarcity is very great. In northern Africa the suffering is still greater. In Algiers the deaths by starvation are so numerous that the victims are buried in trenches like the slain on the battle-field. In Tunis eight thousand have thus perished in two months. The United States consul at that place writes that on the 27th day of December two hundred people starved to death in the streets of that city, and the average daily deaths from that cause exceed one hundred. Our sadness at the contemplation of this picture is mingled with indignation, when we reflect that at the present moment, in the eight principal nations of Europe, there are three million men under arms at an annual cost of nearly a thousand million dollars, an expense which, in twenty years, would pay every national debt in Christendom; and this only the peace establishment! While Napoleon is feeding fifty thousand starving Frenchmen daily from the soup-kitchens of the imperial palace he is compelling the French Legislature to double his army. Whatever distress our people may be suffering, they have reason to be thankful that the bloody monster called the "balance of power" has never cast its shadow upon our country. We have reason, indeed, to be thankful that our people are suffering less than the people of any other nation. But the distress here is unusual for us. It is seen in the depression of business, the stagnation of trade, the high price of provisions, and the great difficulty which laboring men encounter in finding employment. It is said that during the past winter seventy-five thousand laborers of New York city have been unable to find employment. The whole industry of the States lately in rebellion is paralyzed, and in many localities the cry of hunger is heard. It is the imperative duty of Congress to ascertain the cause of this derangement of our industrial forces, and apply whatever remedy legislation can afford. The field is a broad one, the subject is many-sided; but our first step should be to ascertain the facts of our situation.

I shall direct my remarks on this occasion to but one feature of our legislation. I propose to discuss the currency and its relation to the revenue and business prosperity of the country.

OUR INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION.

In April, 1861, there began in this country an industrial revolution, not yet completed, as gigantic in its proportions and as far reaching in its consequences as the political and military revolution through which we have passed. As the first step to any intelligent discussion of the currency it is necessary to examine the character and progress of that industrial revolution.

The year 1860 was one of remarkable prosperity in all branches of business. For seventy years, no Federal tax-gatherer had ever been seen among the laboring population of the United States. Our public debt was less than sixty-five million dollars. The annual expenditures of the Government, including interest on the public debt, were less than sixty-four million dollars. The revenues from customs alone amounted to six sevenths of the expenditures. The value of our agricultural products for that year amounted to $1,625,000,000. Our cotton crop alone was two billion one hundred and fifty-five million pounds, and we supplied to the markets of the world seven eighths of all the cotton consumed. Our merchant marine engaged in foreign trade amounted to two million five hundred and forty-six thousand two hundred and thirty-seven tons, and promised soon to rival the immense carrying trade of England.

FROM PEACE TO WAR.

Let us now observe the effect of the war on the various departments of business. From the moment the first hostile gun was fired, the Federal and State governments became gigantic consumers. As far as production was concerned, eleven States were completely separated from the Union. Two million laborers, more than one third of the adult population of the northern States, were withdrawn from the ranks of producers and became only consumers of wealth. The Federal Government became an insatiable devourer. Leaving out of account the vast sums expended by States, counties, cities, towns, and individuals for the payment of bounties, for the relief of sick and wounded soldiers and their families, and omitting the losses, which can never be estimated, of property destroyed by hostile armies, I shall speak only of expenditures which appear on the books of the Federal Treasury. From the 30th of June, 1861, to the 30th of June, 1866, there were paid out of the Federal Treasury $3,340,996,211, making an aggregate during these four years of more than eight hundred and thirty-six million dollars per annum.

From the official records of the Treasury Department it appears that from the beginning of the American Revolution in 1775, to the beginning of the late rebellion, the total expenditures of the Government for all purposes, including the assumed war debts of the States, amounted to $2,250,000,000. The expenditures of four years of the rebellion were nearly $1,100,000,000 more than all the other Federal expenses since the Declaration of Independence. The debt of England, which had its origin in the revolution of 1688, and was increased by more than one hundred years of war and other political disasters, had reached in 1793 the sum of $1,268,000,000. During the twenty-two years that followed, while England was engaged in a life and death struggle with Napoleon, (the greatest war in history save our own,) $3,056,000,000 were added to her debt. In our four years of war we spent $300,000,000 more than the amount by which England increased her debt in twenty-two years of war; almost as much as she had increased it in one hundred and twenty-five years of war. Now, the enormous demand which this expenditure created for all the products of industry, stimulated to an unparalleled degree every department of business. The plow, furnace, mill, loom, railroad, steamboat, telegraph—all were driven to their utmost capacity. Warehouses were emptied; and the great reserves of supply, which all nations in a normal state keep on hand, were exhausted to meet the demands of the great consumer. For many months, the Government swallowed three millions per day of the products of industry. Under the pressure of this demand, prices rose rapidly in every department of business. Labor everywhere found quick and abundant returns. Old debts were canceled and great fortunes were made.

For the transaction of this enormous business an increased amount of currency was needed; but I doubt if any member of this House can be found, bold enough to deny that the deluge of Treasury notes poured upon the country during the war, was far greater than even the great demands of business. Let it not be forgotten, however, that the chief object of these issues was not to increase the currency of the country. They were authorized with great reluctance and under the pressure of overwhelming necessity, as a temporary expedient to meet the demands of the Treasury. They were really forced loans in the form of Treasury notes. By the act of July 17, 1861, an issue of demand notes was authorized to the amount of $50,000,000. By the act of August 5, 1861, this amount was increased $50,000,000 more. By the act of February 25, 1862, an additional issue of $150,000,000 was authorized. On the 17th of the same month an unlimited issue of fractional currency was authorized. On the 17th of January, 1863, an issue of $150,000,000 more was authorized, which was increased $50,000,000 by the act of March 3, of the same year. This act also authorized the issue of one and two years' Treasury notes, bearing interest at five per cent., to be a legal tender for their face, to the amount of $400,000,000. By the act of June 30, 1864, an issue of six per cent. compound-interest notes, to be a legal tender for their face, was authorized, to the amount of $200,000,000. In addition to this, many other forms of paper obligation were authorized, which, though not a legal tender, performed many of the functions of currency. By the act of March 1, 1862, the issue of an unlimited amount of certificates of indebtedness was authorized, and within ninety days after the passage of the act, there had been issued and were outstanding of these certificates, more than one hundred and fifty-six million dollars. Of course these issues were not all outstanding at the same time, but the acts show how great was the necessity for loans during the war.

The law which made the vast volume of United States notes a legal tender operated as an act of general bankruptcy. The man who loaned $1,000 in July, 1861, payable in three years, was compelled by this law to accept at maturity, as a full discharge of the debt, an amount of currency equal in value to $350 of the money he loaned. Private indebtedness was everywhere canceled. Rising prices increased the profits of business, but this prosperity was caused by the great demand for products, and not by the abundance of paper money. As a means of transacting the vast business of the country, a great volume of currency was indispensable; and its importance cannot be well overestimated. But let us not be led into the fatal error of supposing that paper money created the business or produced the wealth. As well might it be alleged that our rivers and canals produce the grain which they float to market. Like currency, the channels of commerce stimulate production, but cannot nullify the inexorable law of demand and supply.

FROM WAR TO PEACE.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to trace the progress of our industrial revolution in passing from peace to war. In returning from war to peace all the conditions were reversed. At once the Government ceased to be an all-devouring consumer. Nearly two million able bodied men were discharged from the Army and Navy and enrolled in the ranks of the producers. The expenditures of the Government, which for the fiscal year ending June, 30, 1865, amounted to $1,290,000,000, were reduced to $520,000,000 in 1866, to $346,000,000 in 1867; and, if the retrenchment measures recommended by the Special Commissioner of the Revenue be adopted, another year will bring them below $300,000,000.

Thus during the first year after the war the demands of the Federal Government as a consumer, decreased sixty per cent.; and in the second year the decrease had reached seventy-four per cent., with a fair prospect of a still further reduction.

The recoil of this sudden change would have produced great financial disaster in 1866, but for the fact that there was still open to industry the work of replacing the wasted reserves of supply, which in all countries in a healthy state of business, are estimated to be sufficient for two years. During 1866, the fall in price of all articles of industry, amounted to an average of ten per cent. One year ago a table was prepared at my request, by Mr. Edward Young, in the office of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue, exhibiting a comparison of wholesale prices at New York in December, 1865, and December, 1866. It shows that in ten leading articles of provisions there was an average decline of twenty-two per cent., though beef, flour, and other breadstuffs remained nearly stationary. On cotton and woolen goods, boots, shoes, and clothing, the decline was thirty per cent. On the products of manufacture and mining, including coal, cordage, iron, lumber, naval stores, oils, tallow, tin, and wool, the decline was twenty-five per cent. The average decline on all commodities was at least ten per cent. According to the estimates of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue in his late report, the average decline during 1867 has amounted at least to ten per cent. more. During the past two years, Congress has provided by law for reducing internal taxation $100,000,000; and the act passed a few weeks ago, has reduced the tax on manufactures to the amount of $64,000,000 per annum. The repeal of the cotton tax will make a further reduction of $20,000,000. State and municipal taxation and expenditures have also been greatly reduced. The work of replacing these reserves delayed the shock and distributed its effects, but could not avert the inevitable result. During the past two years, one by one, the various departments of industry produced a supply equal to the demand. Then followed a glutted market, a fall in prices, and a stagnation of business by which thousands of laborers were thrown out of employment.

If to this it be added that the famine in Europe and the drought in many of the agricultural States of the Union have kept the price of provisions from falling as other commodities have fallen; we shall have a sufficient explanation of the stagnation of business and the unusual distress among our people.

This industrial revolution has been governed by laws beyond the reach of Congress. No legislation could have arrested it at any stage of its progress. The most that could possibly be done by Congress was to take advantage of the prosperity it occasioned, to raise a revenue for the support of the Government, and to mitigate the severity of its subsequent pressure, by reducing the vast machinery of war to the lowest scale possible. Manifestly nothing can be more absurd than to suppose that the abundance of currency produced the prosperity of 1863, 1864, and 1865, or that the want of it is the cause of our present stagnation.

THE FUNCTIONS OF CURRENCY.

In order to reach a satisfactory understanding of the currency question, it is necessary to consider somewhat fully, the nature and functions of money or any substitute for it.

The theory of money which formed the basis of the "Mercantile system" of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, has been rejected by all leading financiers and political economists for the last seventy-five years. That theory asserted that money is wealth; that the great object of every nation should be to increase its amount of gold and silver; that this was a direct increase of national wealth.

It is now held as an indisputable truth that money is an instrument of trade and performs but two functions. It is a measure of value and a medium of exchange.

In cases of simple barter, where no money is used, we estimate the relative values of the commodities to be exchanged, in dollars and cents, it being our only universal measure of value.

As a medium of exchange, money is to all business transactions, what ships are to the transportation of merchandise. If a hundred vessels of a given tonnage are just sufficient to carry all the commodities between two ports, any increase of the number of vessels will correspondingly decrease the value of each as an instrument of commerce; any decrease below one hundred will correspondingly increase the value of each. If the number be doubled each will carry but half its usual freight, will be worth but half its former value for that trade. There is so much work to be done and no more. A hundred vessels can do it all. A thousand can do no more than all.

The functions of money as a medium of exchange, though more complicated in their application, are precisely the same in principle as the functions of the vessels in the case I have supposed.

If we could ascertain the total value of all the exchanges effected in this country by means of money in any year, and could ascertain how many dollars worth of such exchanges can be effected in a year by one dollar in money, we should know how much money the country needed for the business transactions of that year. Any decrease below that amount will correspondingly increase the value of each dollar as an instrument of exchange. Any increase above that amount will correspondingly decrease the value of each dollar. If that amount be doubled, each dollar of the whole mass will perform but half the amount of business it did before; will be worth but half its former value as a medium of exchange.

Recurring to our illustration: if, instead of sailing vessels, steam vessels were substituted, a much smaller tonnage would be required; so, if it were found that $500,000,000 of paper, each worth seventy cents in gold, were sufficient for the business of the country, it is equally evident that $350,000,000 of gold substituted for the paper would perform precisely the same amount of business.

It should be remembered, also, that any improvement in the mode of transacting business, by which the actual use of money is in part dispensed with, reduces the total amount needed by the country. How much has been accomplished in this direction by recent improvements in banking, may be seen in the operations of the clearing-houses in our great cities.

The records of the New York clearing-house show that from October 11, 1853, the date of its establishment, to October 11, 1867, the exchanges amounted to nearly one hundred and eighty thousand million dollars; to effect which, less than eight thousand millions of money were used; an average of about four per cent.; that is, exchanges were made to the amount of $100,000,000 by the payment of four millions of money.

It is also a settled principle that all deposits in banks drawn upon by checks and drafts, really serve the purpose of money.

The amount of currency needed in the country depends, as we have seen, upon the amount of business transacted by means of money. The amount of business, however, is varied by many causes which are irregular and uncertain in their operation. An Indian war, deficient or abundant harvests, an overflow of the cotton lands of the South, a bread famine or war in Europe, and a score of such causes entirely beyond the reach of legislation, may make money deficient this year and abundant next. The needed amount varies also from month to month in the same year. More money is required in the autumn, when the vast products of agriculture are being moved to market, than when the great army of laborers are in winter-quarters, awaiting the seed time.

When the money of the country is gold and silver, it adapts itself to the fluctuations of business without the aid of legislation. If, at any time, we have more than is needed, the surplus flows off to other countries through the channels of international commerce. If less, the deficiency is supplied through the same channels. Thus the monetary equilibrium is maintained. So immense is the trade of the world that the golden streams pouring from California and Australia into the specie circulation, are soon absorbed in the great mass and equalized throughout the world, as the waters of all the rivers are spread upon the surface of all the seas.

Not so, however, with an inconvertible paper currency. Excepting the specie used in payment of customs and the interest on our public debt, we are cut off from the money currents of the world. Our currency resembles rather the waters of an artificial lake which lie in stagnation or rise to full banks at the caprice of the gatekeeper.

Gold and silver abhor depreciated paper money, and will not keep company with it. If our currency be more abundant than business demands, not a dollar of it can go abroad; if deficient, not a dollar of gold will come in to supply the lack. There is no Legislature on earth, wise enough to adjust such a currency to the wants of the country.

RELATION OF CURRENCY TO PRICES.

Let us examine more minutely the effect of such a currency upon prices. Suppose that the business transactions of the country at the present time require $350,000,000 in gold. It is manifest that if there are just $350,000,000 of legal-tender notes, and no other money in the country, each dollar will perform the full functions of a gold dollar, so far as the work of exchange is concerned. Now, business remaining the same, let $350,000,000 more of the same kind of notes be pressed into circulation. The whole volume, as thus increased, can do no more than all the business. Each dollar will accomplish just half the work that a dollar did before the increase, but as the nominal dollar is fixed by law, the effect is shown in prices being doubled. It requires two of these dollars to make the same purchase that one dollar made before the increase. It would require some time for the business of the country to adjust itself to the new conditions, and great derangement of values would ensue; but the result would at last be reached in all transactions which are controlled by the law of demand and supply.

INCREASE OF THE CURRENCY IS TAXATION.

No such change of values can occur without cost. Somebody must pay for it. Who pays in this case? We have seen that doubling the currency finally results in reducing the purchasing power of each dollar one half; hence every man who held a legal-tender note at the time of the increase, and continued to hold it till the full effect of the increase was produced, suffered a loss of fifty per cent. of its value; in other words, he paid a tax to the amount of half of all the currency in his possession. This new issue, therefore, by depreciating the value of all the currency, cost the holders of the old issue $175,000,000; and if the new notes were received at their nominal value at the date of issue, their holders paid a tax of $175,000,000 more. No more unequal or unjust mode of taxation could possibly be devised. It would be tolerated only by being so involved in the transactions of business as to be concealed from observation; but it would be no less real because hidden.

ITS CHIEF BURDEN FALLS ON THE LABORER.

But some one may say, "This depreciation would fall upon capitalists and rich men who are able to bear it."

If this were true it would be no less unjust. But unfortunately the capitalists would suffer less than any other class. The new issue would be paid in the first place in large amounts to the creditors of the Government; it would pass from their hands before the depreciation had taken full effect, and, passing down step by step through the ranks of middle men, the dead weight would fall at last upon the laboring classes in the increased price of all the necessities of life. It is well known that in a general rise of prices, wages are among the last to rise. This principle was illustrated in the report of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue for the year 1866. It is there shown that from the beginning of the war to the end of 1866, the average price of all commodities had risen ninety per cent. Wages, however, had risen but sixty per cent. A day's labor would purchase but two thirds as many of the necessities of life as it would before. The wrong is therefore inflicted on the laborer long before his income can be adjusted to his increased expenses. It was in view of this truth that Daniel Webster said in one of his ablest speeches:

"Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community, compared with a fraudulent currency and the robberies committed by depreciated paper."

The fraud committed and the burdens imposed upon the people, in the case we have supposed, would be less intolerable if all business transactions could be really adjusted to the new conditions; but even this is impossible. All debts would be canceled, all contracts fulfilled by payment in these notes—not at their real value, but for their face. All salaries fixed by law, the pay of every soldier in the Army, of every sailor in the Navy, and all pensions and bounties would be reduced to half their former value. In these cases the effect is only injurious. Let it never be forgotten that every depreciation of our currency results in robbing the one hundred and eighty thousand pensioners, maimed heroes, crushed and bereaved widows, and homeless orphans, who sit helpless at our feet. And who would be benefited by this policy? A pretense of apology might be offered for it, if the Government could save what the people lose. But the system lacks the support of even that selfish and immoral consideration. The depreciation caused by the over issue in the case we have supposed compels the Government to pay just that percent. more on all the contracts it makes, on all the loans it negotiates, on all the supplies it purchases; and to crown all, it must at last redeem all its legal-tender notes in gold coin, dollar for dollar. The advocates of repudiation have yet been bold enough to deny this.

DEPRECIATED CURRENCY STIMULATES SPECULATION AND OVERTRADING.

I have thus far considered the influence of a redundant paper currency on the country when its trade and industry are in a healthy and normal state. I now call attention to its effect in producing an unhealthy expansion of business, in stimulating speculation and extravagance and in laying the sure foundation of commercial revulsion and wide-spread ruin. This principle is too well understood to require any elaboration here. The history of all modern nations is full of examples. One of the ablest American writers on banks and banking, Mr. Gouge, thus sums up the result of his researches:

There still remains to be considered the effect of depreciated currency on our trade with other nations. By raising prices at home higher than they are abroad, imports are largely increased beyond the exports; our coin must go abroad; or, what is far worse for us, our bonds which have also suffered depreciation and are purchased by foreigners at seventy cents on the dollar. During the whole period of high prices occasioned by the war, gold and bonds have been steadily going abroad, notwithstanding our tariff duties which average nearly fifty per cent. ad valorem. More than five hundred million dollars of our bonds are now held in Europe, ready to be thrown back upon us when any war or other sufficient disturbance shall occur. No tariff rates short of actual prohibition can prevent this outflow of gold while our currency is thus depreciated. During these years also, our merchant marine steadily decreased, and our ship-building interests were nearly ruined.

Our tonnage engaged in foreign trade, which amounted in 1859-60 to more than two and a half million tons, had fallen in 1865-66 to less than one and a half millions—a decrease of more than fifty per cent.; and prices of labor and material are still too high to enable our shipwrights to compete with foreign builders.

From the facts already exhibited in reference to our industrial revolution, and from the foregoing analysis of the nature and functions of currency, it is manifest:

1. That the remarkable prosperity of all industrial enterprise during the war was not caused by the abundance of currency, but by the unparalleled demand for every product of labor.

2. That the great depression of business, the stagnation of trade, the "hard times" which have prevailed during the past year, and which still prevail, have not been caused by an insufficient amount of currency, but mainly by the great falling off of the demand for all the products of labor compared with the increased supply since the return from war to peace.

HOW MUCH CURRENCY IS NEEDED?

I should be satisfied to rest on these propositions without further argument, were it not that the declaration is so often and so confidently made by members of this House, that there is not only no excess of currency, but that there is not enough for the business of the country. I subjoin a table, carefully made up from the official records, showing the amount of paper money in the United States at the beginning of each year from 1834 to 1868, inclusive. The fractions of millions are omitted:

To obtain a full exhibit of the circulating medium of the country for these years, it would be necessary to add to the above, the amount of coin in circulation each year. This amount cannot be ascertained with accuracy, but it is the opinion of those best qualified to judge, that there were about two hundred million dollars of gold and silver coin in the United States at the beginning of the rebellion. It is officially known that the amount held by the banks from 1860 to 1868 inclusive, averaged about ninety-seven million dollars. Including bank reserves, the total circulation of coin and paper never exceeded $400,000,000 before the war. Excluding the bank reserves the amount was never much above $300,000,000. During the twenty-six years preceding the war the average bank circulation was less than one hundred and thirty-nine million dollars.

It is estimated that the amount of coin now in the United States is not less than $250,000,000. When it is remembered that there are now $106,000,000 of coin in the Treasury, that customs duties and interest on the public debt are paid in coin alone, and that the currency of the States and Territories of the Pacific coast is wholly metallic, it will be seen that a large sum of gold and silver must be added to the volume of paper currency in order to ascertain the whole amount of our circulation. It cannot be successfully controverted that the gold, silver, and paper, used as money in this country at this time, amount to $1,000,000,000. If we subtract from this amount our bank reserves—which amounted on the 1st of January last to $162,500,000, and also the cash in the national Treasury, which at that time amounted to $134,000,000—we still have left in active circulation, more than seven hundred million dollars.

It rests with those who assert that our present amount of currency is insufficient, to show that one hundred and fifty per cent. more currency is now needed for the business of the country than was needed in 1860. To escape this difficulty, it has been asserted, by some honorable members, that the country never had currency enough; and that credit was substituted before the war to supply the lack of money. It is a perfect answer to this, that in many of the States a system of free banking prevailed; and such banks pushed into circulation all the money they could find a market for.

RELATION OF CURRENCY TO FINANCIAL PANICS.

The table I have submitted shows how perfect an index the currency is, of the healthy or unhealthy condition of business, and that every great financial crisis, during the period covered by the table, has been preceded by a great increase, and followed by a great and sudden decrease in the volume of paper money. The rise and fall of mercury in the barometer is not more surely indicative of an atmospheric storm, than is a sudden increase or decrease of currency indicative of financial disaster. Within the period covered by the table there were four great financial and commercial crises in this country. They occurred in 1837, 1841, 1854, and 1857. Now, observe the change in the volume of paper currency for those years.

On the 1st day of January, 1837, the amount had risen to $149,000,000, an increase of nearly fifty per cent. in three years. Before the end of that year, the reckless expansion, speculation, and overtrading which caused the increase, had resulted in terrible collapse; and on the 1st of January, 1838, the volume was reduced to $116,000,000. Wild lands, which speculation had raised to fifteen and twenty dollars per acre, fell to one dollar and a half and two dollars, accompanied by a corresponding depression in all branches of business. Immediately after the crisis of 1841 the bank circulation decreased twenty-five per cent., and by the end of 1842 was reduced to $58,500,000, a decrease of nearly fifty per cent.

At the beginning of 1853 the amount was $146,000,000. Speculation and expansion had swelled it to $205,000,000 by the end of that year, and thus introduced the crash of 1854. At the beginning of 1857 the paper money of the country reached its highest point of inflation up to that time. There were nearly two hundred and fifteen millions, but at the end of that disastrous year the volume had fallen to $185,000,000, a decrease of nearly forty per cent. in less than twelve months. In the great crashes preceding 1837 the same conditions are invariably seen—great expansion, followed by a violent collapse, not only in paper money, but in loans and discounts; and those manifestations have always been accompanied by a corresponding fluctuation in prices.

In the great crash of 1819, one of the severest this country ever suffered, there was a complete prostration of business. It is recorded in Niles's Register for 1820 that in that year an Ohio miller sold four barrels of flour to raise five dollars, the amount of his subscription to that paper. Wheat was twenty cents per bushel and corn ten cents. About the same time Mr. Jefferson wrote to Nathaniel Macon:

"We have now no standard of value. I am asked eighteen dollars for a yard of broadcloth which, when we had dollars, I used to get for eighteen shillings."

DOES THE HIGH RATE OF INTEREST INDICATE AN INSUFFICIENT AMOUNT OF CURRENCY?

But the advocates of paper-money expansion answer us:

"It makes no difference what your reasoning may be, we allege the fact that there is great stringency in our money market, great depression in business, and the high rate of interest everywhere demanded, especially in the West, proves conclusively that an increase of currency is needed."

The relation of business to the supply of money and to the rate of interest, has never been so strikingly illustrated as in the financial and business history of Europe during the past two years. At the beginning of 1866 there was great activity and apparent prosperity in the business of Europe. It was a period of speculation and overtrading. About the middle of that year the depression commenced, which has continued and increased till now, when the distress is greater and more widespread than it has been for a quarter of a century. From May, 1866, to the present time, the rate of interest in the principal money centers of Europe has been steadily decreasing. The following table, collated from the London Economist, exhibits the fact that the average decline in nine kingdoms of Europe is fifty per cent.:

RATE OF INTEREST.

	May, 1866.	March, 1868.
	per cent.	per cent.
London.....	7	2
Paris.....	4	1½
Berlin.....	5	3
Vienna.....	7	4
Frankfort.....	6	2½
Amsterdam.....	6½	3
Turin.....	6	5
Madrid.....	9	5
Brussels.....	5	2
Hamburg.....	7	2
St. Petersburg.....	7	8

It will be noticed that the rate is lowest in specie-paying countries, and highest where there is a large volume of depreciated paper money, as in Russia, Spain, and Italy. But the important fact exhibited in this table is, that as commercial distress has increased, the rate of interest has decreased, and that the hard times have been accompanied with an abundant supply of money.

It would be as reasonable for an Englishman to assert that the distress and stagnation of business there has been caused by the plethora of money and the low rate of interest, as for us to claim that our distress is caused by an insufficient currency and a high rate of interest. There, as here, the distress was caused by overproduction and overtrading.

England thought to grow rich out of our misfortunes, and, in her greed, overreached herself and brought misery and ruin upon millions of her people. As a specimen of her crazy expansion of business, witness the fact that in the years 1863, 1864, and 1865, in addition to all other enterprises, there were organized eight hundred and thirty-two joint-stock companies, with an authorized capital of £363,000,000 sterling. During 1866 and 1867, there were organized but seventy-one such companies, with an authorized capital of less than sixteen million five hundred thousand pounds sterling.

The Bankers' Magazine of London, for May, 1867, says that—"In the vaults of the Bank of England, the Bank of France, and in Amsterdam, Frankfort, Hamburg, and Berlin, there are £75,000,000; the rate of discount averages three per cent., and tending downward; yet in each and every one of these cities complaints of the scarcity of money were never more rife."

At the end of 1867, the same magazine, of a later date, says there were £23,500,000 sterling gold in the Bank of England, besides £14,000,000 of coin and paper reserves, but "not the slightest life in trade."

The London Times of December 20, 1867, says:

"We are now paying the penalty of wild speculation and overtrading. For eighteen months, all but the ordinary business of the country is at a standstill." * * * "Millions on millions are lying useless in the various banks of the country because the owners of the money cannot yet prevail upon themselves to trust it in any of the ordinary investments."

From these facts it is evident that those who attribute our hard times to a reduction of the currency will find themselves unable to explain the hard times in Europe.

We are constantly reminded that the country was prosperous at the beginning of 1866, before the currency was reduced, but is now in distress since the reduction, and these two facts are assumed to sustain the relation to each other of cause and effect.

Now, let it be observed that since January, 1866, the volume of paper currency has been reduced sixteen and a half per cent., but during the same time there has been an average decline in prices of not less than twenty per cent.; that is, eighty cents in currency will purchase as many commodities now as a dollar would two years ago; and there are eighty-three and a half cents in currency now to every dollar then. The gold value of our whole volume of currency in January, 1868, was but three and two thirds per cent. less than the gold value of the whole volume in January, 1866. The advocates of expansion should prove that there has been a reduction in the purchasing power of our currency before they deplore the fact.

SCARCITY OF CURRENCY IN THE WEST.

That there is an apparent stringency in our money market generally, and a relative scarcity of currency in the West cannot be doubted. During the past winter, especially, it has been and still is very difficult in the West to obtain money on good business paper. The causes of this are to be found in the improper adjustment of our financial machinery and in the great uncertainty attending our financial legislation. It is a well-settled principle that a currency, not redeemable, tends to find its way to the money centers and stay there.

Most unfortunately for the interest of the country, the national banks have been allowed to receive interest on the deposits they make in the banks at the great money centers. Most of the country banks, therefore, send all their surplus funds to New York, and will not loan money unless they can receive a higher rate than is paid them there. For all practical purposes their notes are equal to greenbacks, and they are never called upon to redeem them. Thus we have a plethora of money in New York and a few other cities, and a scarcity in the country. We are financially in the condition of a sick man suffering with congestive chills; the blood rushes to the heart and leaves the extremities chilled and paralyzed.

The fluctuation of values, caused by the uncertainty of our situation, offers a great temptation to engage in stock and gold speculation, and hence men, who would otherwise be honest producers of wealth, rush to the gold room or the stock market and become the most desperate of gamblers, putting up fortunes to be lost or won on the chances of a day. These men pay enormous margins on their purchases and extravagant interest on their loans. There are tons of paper money at the great commercial centers, to which it flows from all quarters to meet the insane demands of Wall street. Recently a clique of these operators locked up $25,000,000 of greenbacks, and upon them, as a special deposit, borrowed $20,000,000 more for the purpose of creating a sudden stringency in the money market and placing gold and stocks at their mercy.

The vast amount of money daily loaned on call in Wall street, at a high rate of interest, shows how the currency of the country is being used. So long as the national Government takes no steps toward redeeming its own paper, so long will there be nothing to call the notes of the country banks back home; so long will there be no healthy and equal circulation of the currency. If $200,000,000 more currency were now issued, I do not doubt that within two months there would be the same want of money in the rural districts that now prevails. The surplus would flow to the money centers, and the increased prices would make our condition worse than before. It ought not to be forgotten that while the capitalist and speculator are able to take advantage of fluctuations in prices, the poor man has no such power. The necessities of life he must buy day by day, whatever the price may be. He offers for sale only his labor. That he must sell each day, or it will be wholly lost. He is absolutely at the mercy of the market.

INCONVERTIBLE PAPER MONEY HAS NO FIXED VALUE.

But the most serious evil growing out of the condition of our currency is the fact that we have now no fixed and determinate standard of value. It is scarcely possible to exaggerate this evil. If a snow-ball, made at the beginning of winter and exposed to freezing and thawing, snowfall and rainfall, and weighed every day at noon, were made the lawful pound avoirdupois for this country during the winter, we can hardly conceive the confusion and injustice that would attend all transactions depending on weight. The evil, however, would not be universal. Linear, liquid, and many other measures would not be affected by it. But a change of the money standard reaches all values. No transaction escapes. The money unit is the universal measure of value throughout the world. Since the dawn of civilization the science, the art, the statesmanship of the world have been put in requisition to devise and maintain an unvarying and, as far as possible, an invariable standard. For thousands of years gold and silver of a certain weight and fineness have been adopted as the nearest approach to perfection; but even the slight variation in value to which coin is subject from clipping and wear has brought nations to the verge of revolution. No one can read Macaulay's account of the recoinage in England, in the days of William and Mary, without perceiving how directly the happiness and prosperity of a nation depend upon the stability of its money unit. He says:

"It may well be doubted whether all the misery which had been inflicted on the English nation in a quarter of a century by bad kings, bad ministers, bad Parliaments, and bad judges, was equal to the misery caused in one year (1695) by bad crowns and bad shillings."—Hist., vol. 4, chap. 21.

To rescue the nation from the evils of bad shillings, Newton was called from his high realm of discovery, Locke from his profound meditations, Somers and Montague from their seats in Parliament, and these illustrious men spent months in most devoted effort to restore to the realm its standard of value. What could now be of greater service to our country than to direct its highest wisdom and statesmanship to the restoration of our standard? For three quarters of a century the dollar has been our universal measure. A coin containing 23 $\frac{3}{4}$  grains of pure gold, and stamped at the national Mint, has been our only definition of the word dollar. The dollar is the gauge that measures every blow of the ax; every swing of the scythe; every stroke of the hammer; every fagot that blazes on the poor man's hearth; every fabric that clothes his children; every mouthful that feeds their hunger. The word dollar is the substantive word—the fundamental condition of every contract, of every sale, of every payment, whether from the national Treasury or from the stand of the apple-woman in the street. Now, what is our situation? There has been no day since the 25th of February, 1862, when any man could tell what would be the value of our legal-currency dollar the next month or the next day. Since that day we have substituted for a dollar the printed promise of the Government to pay a dollar. That promise we have broken. We have suspended payment, and have by law compelled the citizen to receive dishonored paper in place of money. The value of the paper standard thus forced upon the country by the necessities of the war, has changed every day, and almost every hour of the day, for six years. The value of our paper dollar has passed by thousands of fluctuations from one hundred cents down to thirty-five, and back again to seventy. During the war, in the midst of high prices and large profits, this fluctuation was tolerable. Now that we are making our way back toward old prices and more moderate gains, now that the pressure of hard times is upon us, this uncertainty in our standard of value is an almost intolerable evil. The currency, not being based upon a foundation of real and certain value, and possessing no element of self-adjustment, depends for its market value on a score of causes. It is a significant and humiliating fact that the business men of the nation are in constant dread of Congress. Will Congress increase the currency or contract it? Will new greenbacks be issued with which to take up the bonds; or will new bonds be issued to absorb the greenbacks? Will the national banking system be perpetuated and enlarged, or will it be abolished to enable the General Government to turn banker?

These and a score of kindred questions are agitating the public mind and changing our standard of value with every new turn in the tide of congressional opinion. Monday is a dangerous day for the business of this country while Congress is in session. The broadside of financial resolutions fired from this House on that day, could have no such effect as it now produces if our currency were based on a firm foundation.

Observe how the people pay for this fluctuation of values. Importers, wholesale merchants, and manufacturers, knowing the uncertainties of trade which results from this changeable standard, raise their prices to cover risks. The same thing is done again by retail dealers and middle men, and the whole burden falls at last upon the consumer—the laboring man. And yet we hear honorable gentlemen singing the praises of cheap money!

The vital and incurable evil of an inconvertible paper currency is that it has no elasticity—no quality whereby it adjusts itself to the necessities and contingencies of business.

PAPER MONEY DELUSIONS.

But there is one quality of such a currency more remarkable than all others—its strange power to delude men. The spells and enchantments of legendary witchcraft were hardly so wonderful. Most delusions cannot be repeated; they lose their power after a full exposure. Not so with irredeemable paper money. From the days of John Law its history has been a repetition of the same story, with only this difference: no nation now resorts to its use except from overwhelming necessity; but whenever any nation is fairly embarked, it floats on the delusive waves, and, like the lotus-eating companions of Ulysses, wishes to return no more.

Into this very delusion many of our fellow-citizens and many members of this House have fallen. Hardly a member of either House of the Thirty-Seventh or Thirty-Eighth Congress spoke on the subject who did not deplore the necessity of resorting to inconvertible paper money, and protest against its continuance a single day beyond the inexorable necessities of the war. The remarks of Mr. FESSENDEN, when he reported the first legal-tender bill from the Finance Committee of the Senate, in February, 1862, fully exhibit the sentiment of Congress at that time. He assured the country that the measure was not to be resorted to as a policy; that it was what it professed to be, a temporary expedient; that he agreed with the declaration of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House that it was not contemplated to issue more than $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes. Though he aided in passing the bill, he uttered a warning, the truth and force of which few then questioned. He said:

"All the opinions that I have heard expressed agree in this, that only with extreme reluctance, only with fear and trembling as to the consequences can we have recourse to a measure like this of making our paper a legal tender in the payment of debts."

"All the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, and all who have written on the subject, except some wild speculators in currency, have declared that as a policy it would be ruinous to any people, and it has been defended, as I have stated, simply and solely upon the ground that it is to be a single measure standing by itself and not to be repeated."

"Again, sir, it necessarily changes the values of all property. It is very well known that all over the world gold and silver are recognized as money, as currency; they are the measure of value. We change it here. What is the result? Inflation, subsequent depression, all the evils which follow from an inflated currency. They cannot be avoided; that they are inevitably the consequence is admitted. Although the notes, to be sure, pass precisely at par, gold appreciates, property appreciates—all kinds of property."

This, I repeat, was the almost unanimous sentiment of the Thirty-Seventh Congress; and though subsequent necessity compelled both that and the Thirty-Eighth Congress to make new issues of paper, yet the danger was always confessed and the policy and purpose of speedy resumption were kept steadily in view. So anxious were the members of the Thirty-Eighth Congress that the temptation to new issues should not overcome them or their successors, that they bound themselves by a kind of financial temperance pledge, that there never should be a further increase of legal-tender notes. Witness the following clause of the loan act of June 30, 1864:

"SEC. 2." * * * * "Provided, That the total amount of bonds and Treasury notes authorized by the first and second sections of this act shall not exceed $400,000,000 in addition to the amounts heretofore issued; nor shall the total amount of United States notes, issued or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan."

Here is a solemn pledge to the public creditors, a compact with them, that the Government will never issue non-interest-paying notes beyond the sum total of $450,000,000. When the war ended, the Thirty-Ninth Congress, adopting the views of its predecessors on this subject, regarded the legal-tender currency a part of the war machinery, and proceeded to reduce and withdraw it in the same manner in which the Army and Navy and other accompaniments of the War were reduced. Ninety-five gentlemen who now occupy seats in this Hall were members of this House on the 18th of December, 1865, when it was resolved by a vote of 144 yeas to 6 nays—

"That this House cordially concurs in the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of a contraction of the currency with a view to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business interests of the country will permit; and we hereby pledge cooperative action to this end as speedily as practicable."

Since the passage of that resolution the currency has been reduced by an amount less than one sixth of its volume, and what magic wonders have been wrought in the opinions of members of this House and among the financial philosophers of the country? A score of honorable gentlemen have exhausted their eloquence in singing the praises of greenbacks. They insist that, at the very least, Congress should at once set the printing presses in motion to restore the $70,000,000 of national treasure so ruthlessly reduced to ashes by the incendiary torch of the Secretary of the Treasury. Another, claiming that this would be a poor and meager offering to the offended paper god, introduces a bill to print and issue $140,000,000 more. The philosopher of Lewiston, the Democratic Representative of the ninth district of Illinois, [Mr. Ross,] thinks that a new issue of $700,000,000 will for the present meet the wants of the country. Another, perceiving that the national bank notes are dividing the honors with greenbacks, proposes to abolish these offending corporations and, in lieu of their notes, issue $300,000,000 in greenbacks, and thus increase the active circulation by over one hundred millions, the amount now held as bank reserves; and finally the Democratic masses of the West are rallying under the leadership of the coming man, the young statesman of Cincinnati, who proposes to cancel with greenbacks the $1,500,000,000 of fifty-two bonds, and with his election to the Presidency usher in the full millennial glory of paper money! And this is the same George H. Pendleton who denounced as unconstitutional the law which authorized the first issue of greenbacks, and concluded an elaborate speech against the passage of the bill in 1862 with these words:

"You send these notes out into the world stamped with irredeemability. You put on them the mark of Cain, and like Cain, they will go forth to be vagabonds and fugitives on the earth. What, then, will be the consequence? It requires no prophet to tell what will be their history. The currency will be expanded; prices will be inflated; fixed values will depreciate; incomes will be diminished; the savings of the poor will vanish; the hoardings of the widow will melt away; bonds, mortgages, and notes, everything of fixed value, will lose their value; everything of changeable value will be appreciated; the necessities of life will rise in value." * * * "Contraction will follow. Private ruin and public bankruptcy, either with or without REPUDIATION, will inevitably follow."

REAL CAUSE OF THE REACTION.

The chief cause of this new-born zeal for paper money is the same as that which led a member of the Continental Congress to exclaim:

"Do you think, gentlemen, that I will consent to load my constituents with taxes when we can send to the printer and get a wagon load of money, one quire of which will pay for the whole!"

The simple fact in the case is that Congress went resolutely and almost unanimously forward in the policy of gradual resumption of specie payments, and a return to the old standard of values, until the pressure of falling prices and hard times began to be felt; and now many are shrinking from the good work they have undertaken, are turning back from the path they so worthily resolved to pursue, and are asking Congress to plunge the nation deeper than ever into the abyss from which it has been struggling so earnestly to escape. Did any reflecting man suppose it possible for the country to return from the high prices, the enormous expansion of business, debt, and speculation occasioned by the war, without much depression and temporary distress? The wit of man has never devised a method by which the vast commercial and industrial interests of a nation can suffer the change from peace to war, and from war back to peace, without hardship and loss. The homely old maxim, "What goes up must come down," applies to our situation with peculiar force. The "coming down" is inevitable. Congress can only break the fall and mitigate its evils by adjusting the taxation, the expenditures, and the currency of the country, to the changed conditions of affairs. This it is our duty to do with a firm and steady hand.

Much of this work has already been done. Our national expenditures have been very considerably reduced, but the work of retrenching expenditures can go and should go much further. Very many, perhaps too many, of our national taxes have been removed. But if this Congress shall consent to break down the dikes, and let in on the country a new flood of paper money for the temporary relief of business, we shall see all the evils of our present situation return after a few months with redoubled force.

It is my clear conviction that the most formidable danger with which the country is now threatened is a large increase in the volume of paper money.

OUR PAST EXPERIENCE—COLONIAL PAPER.

Shall we learn nothing from experience? Shall the warnings of the past be unheeded? What other nation has so painfully spelled out, letter by letter and word by word, the terrible meaning of irredeemable paper money, whether known by the name of colonial bills, continental currency, or notes of dishonored banks? Most of the colonies had suffered untold evils from depreciated paper before the Revolution. Massachusetts issued her first bills of credit in 1690 to meet a war debt, and after sixty years of vain and delusive efforts to make worthless paper serve the purposes of money, found her industry perishing under the weight of colony bills equal in nominal value to $11,000,000, which, though made a legal tender and braced up by the severest laws, were worth but twelve per cent. of their face; and under the lead of Hutchinson, a far-sighted and courageous statesman, in 1750, resumed specie payment, canceled all her bills, and by law prohibited the circulation of paper money within her borders and made it a crime punishable by a fine of £100 for any Governor to approve any bill to make it a legal tender.

For the next quarter of a century Massachusetts enjoyed the blessings of a sound currency. Rhode Island clung to the delusion many years longer. More than one hundred pages of Arnold's history of that Colony are devoted to portraying the distress and confusion resulting from this cause alone. The history of every Colony that issued bills is a repetition of the same sad story.

CONTINENTAL CURRENCY.

The financial history of the Revolution is too familiar to need repetition here, but there are points in that history, of which an American Congress cannot be too often reminded. Nowhere else were all the qualities of irredeemable paper money so fully exhibited. From the first emission of $2,000,000, in 1775, till the last in 1781, when $360,000,000 had been issued, there appeared to be a purpose, perpetually renewed but always broken, to restrict the amount and issue no more. Each issue was to be the last. But notwithstanding the enormous volume reluctantly put in circulation, our fathers seemed to believe that its value could be kept up by legislation. They denounced in resolutions of Congress the first depreciation of these bills as the work of enemies; and in January, 1776, resolved—

"That if any person shall hereafter be so lost to all virtue and regard for his country as to refuse to receive said bills in payment, &c., he shall be treated as an enemy and precluded from all trade or intercourse with the inhabitants of these Colonies."

But they found before the struggle ended that the inexorable laws of value were above human legislation; that resolutions cannot nullify the truths of the multiplication table.

The bills passed nearly at par until the issues exceeded nine millions. At the end of 1776 they were worth seventy-five per cent. of their nominal value; at the end of 1777, twenty-five; at the end of 1778, sixteen; at the end of 1779, two and a half; and at the end of 1780 they were worth but one cent on the dollar. Four months later $500 in continental bills were selling for one dollar in specie. Peletiah Webster, in 1790, said:

"The fatal error that the credit and currency of continental money could be kept up and supported by acts of compulsion, entered so deep into the minds of Congress and all departments of administration through the States, that no consideration of justice, religion, or policy, or even experience of its utter inefficiency, could eradicate it; it seemed a kind of obstinate delirium, totally deaf to every argument drawn from justice and right, from its natural tendency and mischief, and from common justice, and even from common sense." * * * "This ruinous principle was continued in practice for five successive years, and appeared in all shapes and forms, i. e., legal-tender acts, limitation of prices, in awful and threatening declarations, and in penal laws." * * * "Many thousand families of full and easy fortune were ruined by these fatal measures, and lie in ruins to-day. (1790.) without the least benefit to the country or to the great and noble cause in which they were then engaged."

In summing up the evils of the continental currency, after speaking of the terrible hardships of the war, the destruction of property by the enemy, who at times during its progress held eleven out of the thirteen State capitals, Mr. Webster, who had seen it all, said:

"Yet these evils were not as great as those which were caused by continental money and the consequent irregularities of the financial system. We have suffered from this cause more than from every other cause of calamity; it has killed more men; pervaded and corrupted the choicest interests of our country more, and done more injustice than even the arms and artifices of our enemies."

But let it never be forgotten that the fathers of the Revolution saw, at last, the fatal error into which they had fallen, and even in the midst of their great trials restored to the young nation then struggling for its existence its standard of value, its basis for honest and honorable industry.

In 1781 Robert Morris was appointed Superintendent of Finance. He made a return to specie payments the condition of his acceptance; and on the 22d of May Congress declared "That the calculation of the expenses of the present campaign shall be made in solid coin;" and—

"That experience having evinced the inefficiency of all attempts to support the credit of paper money by compulsory acts, it is recommended to such States where laws making paper bills a tender yet exist to repeal the same."

Thus were the financial interests of the nation rescued from dishonor and utter ruin.

PAPER MONEY AFTER THE REVOLUTION.

The state of the currency from the close of the war to the establishment of the Government under the Constitution was most deplorable. The separate States had been seized with the mania for paper money, and were rivaling each other in the extravagance of their issues and the rigor of their financial laws. One by one they were able, at last, to conquer the evils into which paper money had plunged them. In 1786 James Madison wrote from Richmond, to General Washington, the joyful news that the Virginia Legislature had, by a majority of 84 to 17, voted—

"Paper money unjust, impolitic, destructive of pub-lie and private confidence, and of that virtue which is the basis of republican government."

The paper money of Massachusetts was the chief cause of Shay's rebellion. The paper money of Rhode Island kept that State for several years from coming into the Union.

Nearly half a century afterwards, Daniel Webster, reviewing the financial history of the period now under consideration, said:

"From the close of the war to the time of the adoption of this Constitution, as I verily believe, the people suffered as much, except in loss of life, from the disordered state of the currency and the prostration of commerce and business as they suffered during the war."

With such an experience, it is not wonderful that the framers of our Constitution should have undertaken to protect their descendants from the evils they had themselves endured.

PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION IN REFERENCE TO PAPER MONEY.

By reference to the Madison Papers, volume three, pages 1343-6, it will be seen that in the first draft of the Constitution there was a clause giving Congress the power "to borrow money and emit bills on the credit of the United States."

On the 16th of August, 1787, during the final revision, Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out the clause authorizing the emission of bills. Mr. Madison declared that he voted to strike it out so as to "cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender either for public or private debts." Mr. Billsworth "thought this a favorable time to shut and bar the door against paper money. The mischief of the various experiments which had been made were now fresh in the public mind and had excited the disgust of all the respectable part of America." Mr. Read "thought that the words, if not struck out, would be as alarming as the mark of the Beast in Revelation." Mr. Langdon had rather reject the whole "plan than retain the three words 'and emit bills.'"

The clause was stricken out by a vote of nine States to two. Twelve days later Roger Sherman, remarking that "this is a favorable crisis for crushing paper money," moved "to prohibit the States from emitting bills of credit, or making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." This clause was placed in the Constitution by a vote of eight States to two. Thus our fathers supposed they had protected us against the very evil which now afflicts the nation.

THE EXPERIENCE OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The doctrines which I am advocating in reference to the evils of an inconvertible currency are strongly corroborated by the financial experience of Great Britain. One of the ablest of English writers on finance thus sums up the history of panics and commercial distress:

"From the undue or unnecessary increase of the currency, which could not take place if the whole were metallic, we have the origin and sole cause of general speculation and overtrading, which proceed with its increase, and in their progress demand or require new additions to the circulation and credit; and from this consequent facility of obtaining credit, may far outstrip the actual increase of the currency, a state of things that cannot be prolonged beyond the safety of the bank, which again depends on the stock of the treasure. The issues are then contracted; this is followed by the contraction of the country circulation, credit is destroyed, and suddenly our market assumes the appearance of low prices, overproduction, or indefinite supply. If this principle is applied to the contraction of our currency in 1815 and 1816, with the low prices that followed; its extension in 1817 and 1818, and the general speculation, overtrading, and high prices that succeeded; and again to its contraction in 1819, 1820, 1821, and 1822, and the general complaint of abundance of foreign and home products, and low prices that continued through these years; and lastly, to the increase of the currency in 1824 and part of 1825 with the accompanying rage of speculation, overtrading, and high prices that followed, we see the establishment of the principle in all its forms."—Musket on Money, p. 182.

NECESSITY OF A SETTLED POLICY.

To review briefly the ground traveled over; we have seen that the hard times and depression of business which the country is now suffering was caused in the first instance by the great industrial revolution which grew out of the war, and that its evils have been aggravated and are in danger of being indefinitely continued by the unsettled condition of our currency and by the uncertainty of congressional legislation; that we have not now, and, without decisive legislation, cannot have a fixed standard of value, and therefore all trade and business are at the mercy of political sensations and business intrigues, the evils of which fall heaviest upon the laboring man; that the greatest financial danger which threatens us is that some of the schemes now before Congress may result in a large increase of irredeemable paper money, for which there can be no defense except such an overwhelming necessity as compelled Congress to use it, in the moment of supreme peril, to save the life of the nation; that history is full of warnings against such a policy; that during our colonial period, during the war of the Revolution, and after the war, our fathers tested and practically exploded the very theories now in vogue respecting paper money, and attempted so to frame the Constitution as to shield us from the calamities they suffered; and finally, that these views are fully confirmed by the financial history of England. From these considerations it appears to me that the first step toward a settlement of our financial and industrial affairs should be to adopt and declare to the country a fixed and definite policy, so that industry and enterprise may be based upon confidence; so that men may know what to expect from the Government; and, above all, that the course of business may be so adjusted that it shall be governed by the laws of trade, and not by the caprice of any man or of any political party in or out of Congress.

WHAT HAS THE FORTIETH CONGRESS DONE IN REFERENCE TO THIS SUBJECT?

Thus far, nothing has been done, except to abandon the policy which we have been pursuing for the past two years. By joint resolution of January 16, it was ordered that there should be no further contraction of the currency; but the Committee of Ways and Means not only did not indicate what policy they should recommend, but they gave no reasons for the measure they reported, nor did they allow any debate or question by others. I voted against that resolution, not because I was in favor of continuing without change the policy we were then pursuing, but because I believed, as has since been manifest, that a large party in this House intended not to stop there, but to make that resolution the first step toward inflation. Against that policy I made the only protest left to me, by voting against the first measure in the programme.

THE CONTRACTION POLICY.

That contraction of the currency tended toward specie payments, few will deny; but that there were serious evils connected with it, is also manifest. The element of uncertainty was the chief evil. It was never known whether the Secretary of the Treasury would use the power placed in his hands, during any given month, or not; and the stringency caused by contraction was always anticipated and generally exaggerated. The actual contraction had far less influence on business than the expectation of it. In connection with this policy the efforts of the Secretary to keep the gold market steady, by sales from the Treasury, increased the uncertainty and led to a very general feeling that it was unwise to put the control of business and prices, to so great an extent, in the hands of any one man; especially of one so involved in the political antagonisms of the hour as the present Secretary.

The financial schemes and plans now before Congress are so numerous and so contradictory, as to give us little hope that any comprehensive policy can be agreed on at present. For myself, I have but little faith in panaceas; in remedies which will cure all evils; in any one plan which will reach all the difficulties of our situation.

Above all, it seems to me unwise to complicate the questions that are pressing for immediate solution, with those which refer to subjects not yet ripe for action. For example, I have not yet seen the wisdom of making the redemption of the five-twenty bonds—not one of which is payable for fourteen years to come—a prominent element in our legislation at this time. In the midst of so many difficulties, it is better to do one thing at a time, and to do it carefully and thoroughly.

PLAN FOR RESTORING THE STANDARD OF VALUE.

On the 10th of February I introduced a bill which, if it should become a law, will, I believe, go far toward restoring confidence and giving stability to business, and will lay the foundation on which a general financial policy may be based, whenever opinions are so harmonized as to make a general policy possible.

As the bill is short, I will quote it entire, and call attention for a few moments to its provisions:

A bill to provide for a gradual return to specie payments.

*Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the 1st day of December, 1868, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay gold coin of the United States for any legal-tender notes of the United States, which may be presented at the office of the Assistant Treasurer, at New York, at the rate of one dollar in gold for one dollar and thirty cents in legal-tender notes. On and after the 1st day of January, 1869, the rate shall be one dollar in gold for one dollar and twenty-nine cents in legal-tender notes; and at the beginning of and during each succeeding month the amount of legal-tender notes required in exchange for one dollar in gold shall be one cent less than the amount required during the preceding month, until the exchange becomes one dollar in gold for one dollar in legal-tender notes; and on and after the 1st day of June, 1871, the Secretary of the Treasury shall exchange gold for legal-tender notes, dollar for dollar: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the retirement or cancellation of any legal-tender notes of the United States.*

To all plans hitherto proposed it has been objected that the vast amount of public debt yet to be funded, and the still larger amount of private indebtedness, the value of which would be changed in favor of the creditor and against the debtor, made it impossible to return to specie payments without great loss both to the Government and to the debtor class.

I have no doubt that an immediate or sudden resumption of payments would prove a heavy shock to business and very greatly disturb the present scale of values. These objections are almost wholly avoided in the bill I have proposed, by making the return gradual; and the time when the process is to begin is placed so far ahead as to give full notice and allow the country to adjust its business to the provisions of the act.

By the 1st of December next, the floating and temporary debt of the United States will be funded, in accordance with laws already in operation; the excitement and derangement of business incident to a presidential election will be over, and we ought to be ready at that time, if ever, to take decisive steps toward the old paths.

I do not doubt that, in anticipation of the operation of this measure, should it become a law, gold would be at 130, or lower, by the 1st of December, and that very little would be asked for, from the Treasury, in exchange for currency. At the beginning of each succeeding month, the exchange between gold and greenbacks would be reduced one cent, and specie payments would be fully resumed in June, 1871. That the country is fully able to resume by that time, will hardly be denied.

With the $100,000,000 of gold now in the Treasury, and the amount received from customs, which averages nearly half a million per day, it is not at all probable that we should need to borrow a dollar in order to carry out the provisions of the law.

But taking the most unfavorable aspect of the case, and supposing that the Government should find it necessary to authorize a gold loan, the expense would be trifling compared with the resulting benefits to the country. The proposed measure would incidentally bring all the national banks to the aid of the Government in the work of resumption. The banks are required by law to redeem their own notes in greenbacks. They now hold in their vaults, as a reserve required by law, $162,000,000, of which sum $114,000,000 are greenbacks. Being compelled to pay the same price for their own notes as for greenbacks, they would gradually accumulate a specie reserve, and would be compelled to keep abreast with the Government in every step of the progress toward resumption. The necessity of redeeming their own notes would keep their circulation nearer home, and would more equally distribute the currency of the country which now concentrates at the great money centers, and produces scarcity in the rural districts.

This measure would not at once restore the old national standard of value, but it would give stability to business and confidence to business men everywhere. Every man who contracts a debt would know what the value of a dollar would be when the debt became due. The opportunity now afforded to Wall street gamblers to run up and run down the relative price of gold and greenbacks would be removed. The element of chance, which now vitiates our whole industrial system, would, in great part, be eliminated.

If this measure be adopted it will incidentally settle several of our most troublesome questions. It will end the war between the contractionists and the inflationists—a war which, like that of Marius and Sylla—may almost prove fatal to the interests of the country whichever side may prevail. The amount of paper money will regulate itself, and may be unlimited, so long as every dollar is convertible into specie at the will of the holder.

The still more difficult question of paying our five-twenty bonds would be avoided—completely flanked by this measure. The money paid to the wounded soldier, and to the soldier's widow, would soon be made equal in value to the money paid to all other creditors of the Government.

It will be observed that the bill does not authorize the cancellation or retirement of any United States notes. It is believed that, for a time at least, the volume of the currency may safely remain as it now is. When the measure has been in force for some time it will be seen whether the increased use of specie for purposes of circulation will not allow a gradual reduction of the legal-tender notes. This can be safely left to subsequent legislation. It will facilitate the success of this plan, if Congress will pass a bill to legalize contracts hereafter made for the payment of coin. If this be done, many business men will conduct their affairs on a specie basis, and thus retain at home much of our gold that now goes abroad.

ENGLISH PRECEDENT.

I have not been ambitious to add another to the many financial plans proposed to this Congress, much less have I sought to introduce a new and untried scheme. On the contrary, I regard it a strong commendation of this measure, that it is substantially the same as that by which Great Britain resumed specie payments, after a suspension of nearly a quarter of a century.

The situation of England at that time was strikingly similar to our present situation. She had just emerged from a great war in which her resources had been taxed to the utmost. Business had been expanded and high prices prevailed. Paper money had been issued in unusual volume, was virtually a legal tender, and had depreciated to the extent of twenty-five per cent. Every financial evil from which we now suffer prevailed there, and was aggravated by having been longer in operation. Plans and theories without end were proposed to meet the many difficulties of the case. For ten years the Bank of England and the majority in Parliament vehemently denied that paper money had depreciated, notwithstanding the unanswerable report of the Bullion Committee of 1810, and the undeniable fact that it took twenty-five per cent. more of notes than of coin to buy an ounce of gold.

Many insisted that paper was a better standard of value than coin. Some denounced the attempt to return to specie as unwise; others as impossible. William Cobbett, the famous pamphleteer, announced that he would give himself up to be broiled on a gridiron whenever the bank should resume cash payments; and for many years kept the picture of a gridiron at the head of his Political Register, to remind his readers of his prophecy. Every phase of the question was discussed by the best minds of the kingdom in and out of Parliament for more than ten years; and in May, 1819, under the lead of Robert Peel, a law was passed fixing the time and mode of resumption.

It provided that on the 1st of February, 1820, the bank should give, in exchange for its notes, gold bullion in quantities not less than sixty ounces, at the rate of $1s. per ounce; that from the 1st of October, 1820, the rate should be 79s. 6d.; from the 1st of May, 1822, 79s. 10½d.; and on the 1st of May, 1823, the bank should redeem all its notes in coin, whatever the amount presented. The passage of the act gave once more a fixed and certain value to money; and business so soon adjusted itself to the measure in anticipation, that specie payments were fully resumed on the 1st of May, 1821, two years before the time fixed by the law. Forty-seven years have elapsed since then, and the verdict of history has approved the wisdom of the act, notwithstanding the clamor and outcry which at first assailed it. So plainly does this lesson apply to us, that in the preface to one of the best histories of England, recently published, the author, who is an earnest friend of the United States, says:

"It seems to me that no thoughtful citizen of any nation can read the story of the years before and after Peel's bill of 1819, extending over the crash of 1825-26, without the strongest desire that such risks and calamities may be avoided in his own country, at any sacrifice. There are several countries under the doom of retribution for the license of an inconvertible paper currency; and of these the United States are unhappily one. This passage of English history may possibly help to check the levity with which the inevitable 'crash' is spoken of by some who little dream what the horrors and griefs of such a convulsion are. It may do more if it should show any considerable number of observers that the affairs of the economic world are as truly and certainly under the control of natural laws as the world of matter without, and that of mind within."

This testimony of a friend is worthy our profoundest consideration. I will make no apology for the length to which I have extended these remarks. The importance of the subject demanded it. The decision we shall reach on this question will settle or unsettle the foundations of public credit, of the public faith, and of individual and national prosperity. The time and manner of paying the bonds; the refunding the national debt; the continuance or abolition of the national banks, and many other propositions, depend for their wisdom or unwisdom on the settlement of this question. I know we are told that resumption of specie payments will increase the value of the public debt, and thus add to the burden of taxation; and we are told, with special emphasis, that the people will not tolerate any increase of their burdens; that they demand plenty of money and a return of high prices. But, sir, I have learned to think better of the American people than to believe that they are not willing to know the worst and to provide for it. I remember that after the first defeat at Bull Run many officers of the Government thought it not safe to let the people know, at once, the full extent of the disaster; but the news should be broken gently that the nation might be better able to bear it. Long before the close of the war, it was found that Cabinet and Congress and all the officers of the United States needed for themselves to draw hope and courage from the great heart of the people. It was only necessary for the nation to know the extent of the danger, the depth of the need, and its courage, faith, and endurance were always equal to the necessity. It is now, as ever, our highest duty to deal honestly and frankly with the people who sent us here, in reference to their financial and industrial affairs; to assure them that the path of safety is a narrow and rugged one; that by economy and prudence, by much patience and some suffering, they must come down, by slow and careful steps, from the uncertain and dangerous height to which the war carried them, or they will fall at last, in financial ruin more sudden and calamitous than any yet recorded in the history of mankind.

For my own part, my course is taken. In view of all the facts of our situation; of all the terrible experiences of the past, both at home and abroad; and of the united testimony of the wisest and bravest statesmen who have lived and labored during the last century, it is my firm conviction that any considerable increase of the volume of our inconvertible paper money will shatter public credit, will paralyze industry and oppress the poor; and that the gradual restoration of our ancient standard of value will lead us, by the safest and surest path, to national prosperity and the steady pursuits of peace.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. ALLISON, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS ETC.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of citizens of Cameron county, Texas, for a division of said State; also of Darker county, against the same.

By Mr. FIELDS: The petition of Mathew C. Griswold, of Norwich, Chenango county, New York, asking Congress to pass a special act by which his name will be placed on the pension-rolls, to date from the day of his discharge, January 1, 1865.

By Mr. KELLEY: A memorial of the sugar refiners of Philadelphia, asking a new classification of sugars and an increased duty thereon.

By Mr. LINCOLN: The petition of Joshua R. Sands, in reference to the pay of officers in the Navy.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of W. H. Gardner, assistant surgeon United States Army, and others, of Fort Ransom, Dakota Territory, praying for a pension to William Smith, late a corporal in the tenth United States infantry.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 16, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.
Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, as the Legislative Journal is very long, I move that the reading be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. YATES presented a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory, in favor of an additional appropriation for the purpose of building a penitentiary in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill No. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, as a member of the Judiciary Committee I have not been able to agree to that report; and, if I can do so before the subject is considered in the Senate, I may desire to present my views in a written report.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before that passes from the consideration of the Senate, lest there should be some misapprehension hereafter, the Senator from Indiana having indicated that he may desire to present his views in the shape of a report, I wish to suggest that as no written report is made by the majority of the committee I suppose it would hardly be regular to make a minority report. Of course the Senator will be permitted to present his views; but it could hardly be in the shape of a report, I take it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Should I be able to prepare my report before the Senate considers the bill, when it is presented I suppose the question suggested by the Senator from Illinois will arise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing before the Senate at present.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I have in my hand an amendment to that bill, which I desire to offer when it comes up for consideration. I wish that it may be printed in advance of that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received informally and ordered to be printed, if there be no objection. The order to print will be entered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. THAYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 482) to quiet the title to lands in the town of Santa Clara, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House No. 91, concerning certain lands granted to railroad companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 445) for the relief of Timothy Lyden, of Parkersburg, West Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress;

A bill (H. R. No. 1059) to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities;

A bill (H. R. No. 1062) to grant the right of way to the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 1068) to provide for certain claims against the Department of Agriculture;

A bill (H. R. No. 1069) for the relief of Charles B. Tanner, late first lieutenant sixty-ninth Pennsylvania volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1070) for the relief of James Rock, of Saginaw, in the State of Michigan;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 264) to provide for the sale of the site of Fort Covington, in the State of Maryland; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 265) for the relief of Edward E. Shead, of Eastport, State of Maine.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

An act (S. No. 475) to extend the charter of Washington city, also to regulate the selection of officers, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 416) for the relief of John S. Cunningham, paymaster United States Navy;

An act (S. No. 358) providing for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander Trevett Abbott, of the United States Navy, to the active list of the Navy;

An act (S. No. 462) making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and other contingent expenses of the Senate for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 126) for the relief of George W. Doty, a commander in the United States Navy on the retired list; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 118) for the appointment of a commission to select suitable locations for powder magazines.

RAILROADS IN WISCONSIN AND MICHIGAN.

Mr. HOWE. One of the bills which has just come from the House of Representatives has an amendment to it. If there is no sort of objection, and there is nothing else to do, I would like the Senate to consider it and concur in the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. Can they not be taken up for the purpose of referring them, and when we come to that act upon it?

Mr. HOWE. The Chief Clerk has that bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to proceed to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) concerning certain lands granted to railroad companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 91.

The amendment was to add to the Senate amendments the following proviso:

And provided further, That if the said Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, in the State of Michigan, shall not have completed according to law ten additional miles of their railroad on or before the 1st day of January, 1869, and shall not in like manner complete ten miles of said railroad in each and every year thereafter, then it shall be lawful for the Legislature of the said State of Michigan to declare the grant of lands to said company to be forfeited and to confer the said grant of lands upon some other company in the same manner as if the said grant was now for the first time made to said State of Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I hope this may be permitted to go over. It is a bill in which I had some concern when it was in the Senate before; and it appears to me that the effect of this amendment, from just hearing it read once, will be that if this Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company shall not build the road it will be open to the State of Michigan to give the lands to any other railroad company in any part of the State of Michigan; whereas the lands ought to be devoted, if they are devoted to that purpose at all, to the construction of the line between those two places, which, of course, was the spirit as well as the letter of the law that Congress has already passed upon the subject. I therefore hope my friend from Wisconsin will permit it to lie on the table. It can be taken up at any time. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 445) for the relief of Timothy Lyden, of Parkersburg, West Virginia—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1059) to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1062) to grant the right of way to the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The bill (H. R. No. 1068) to provide for certain claims against the Department of Agriculture—to the Committee on Agriculture.

The bill (H. R. No. 1069) for the relief of Charles B. Tanner, late first lieutenant sixty-ninth Pennsylvania volunteers—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 1070) for the relief of James Rock, of Saginaw, in the State of Michigan—to the Committee on Claims.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 264) to provide for the sale of the site of Fort Covington, in the State of Maryland—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 265) for the relief of Edward E. Shead, of Eastport, State of Maine—to the Committee on Claims.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the President pro tempore vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice of the United States.

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, having adjourned, the President pro tempore resumed the chair and called the Senate to order at seven minutes past one o'clock p. m.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in reference to an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That at the adjournment on Saturday, the 10th instant, a recess be taken until Monday, the 25th instant.

Mr. CONKLING. I demand the yeas and nays on that resolution; and, besides making that demand, I should like to hear from some Senator who advocates it the reason for this proposition that the Senate take a recess until the 25th instant.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the reason is they want to go home.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend from Kentucky is always obliging. He volunteers to give me a reason.

Mr. DAVIS. My reason is that I want to go home.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that is a very poor reason, Mr. President. I did not intend to say a word about this resolution, but I beg to make one remark. The House of Representatives is far in advance of the Senate in legislative business. I refer now particularly to appropriation bills and to the bills relating to the lately rebel States. It is now far in the season, and the House of Representatives for nearly three months has been substantially at large, its members going without let or hindrance, and the truth being that for a large part of the time only a small fraction of a quorum of the House has been here. At the end of that time of vacation and relief they propose a further adjournment of ten days, or whatever it may be. I see no reason why we should agree to it out of regard to the convenience of the House; and as to our own convenience, although Senators may like to go to the Chicago convention, I think they will not like to stay here through the dog-days, and that certainly is to be the result if we are to go over practically until the 1st of June. We are to commence, then, in the summer months to dispose of the large residuum of legislation which remains; and the more postponement we take now the longer in point of actual duration will be the remainder of the session, I submit to Senators.

I have no doubt my personal convenience and disposition would be consulted as much as that of almost any other Senator by being exempted from labor and attendance here for some time to come; but, looking to the real convenience of everybody, it seems to me that we ought at once to address ourselves to the remaining legislation of the session, to the end that we may finish at the earliest day—at a day which shall carry us as little way as possible into the hot season. I shall vote against this order, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it, even if we are to hear no reason why it should be adopted.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if there be good reasons for the proposed adjournment I should like to hear them; I am not advised of them now. There is a large amount of business to be done, and that must be done before this Congress finally adjourns. We have lost some sixty days in this trial; the summer is approaching, and if we shall make this adjournment it will keep us at least that much longer in the hot weather. I do not want to stay here through the months of July and August, but if we shall waste our time as we now propose to do we shall probably stay here all summer, unless we adjourn without having transacted the necessary and important business of the country. If there are Senators here who are delegates to the Chicago convention and want to go, let them go. I believe the number is very few. They will certainly be excused for going under the circumstances; but the number is small, and there will be remaining here a Senate to transact business. If there be any good reasons why the Senate should adjourn let them be stated.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Mr. President, the gentlemen who have spoken seem to forget the fact that an adjournment at least of a few days at this season of the year has always been necessary in order that the Chambers of the two Houses may be cleansed and put in their summer garments, the carpets taken up and matting put down. That is usual at this season in order to prepare for the hot weather, of which some gentlemen have so much dread; and it is for that reason, as I suppose, that this adjournment is asked.

Besides, when an exciting convention to prepare for an approaching campaign was about to be held, and gentlemen wished to be absent to go to it, I do not know that there has ever been a refusal to extend that privilege. But if there were no convention at Chicago, these Chambers need cleansing in order to be fitted for our comfortable use during the summer, and I think that is abundant reason for the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I assure the Senate that it is not from any desire to go to the Chicago convention that I vote for this recess, [laughter;] but, according to the suggestion of my honorable friend from West Virginia, ever since I have had any knowledge of Congress, during the long session it has been usual to make arrangements for the hot months by the readjustment of the halls of legislation, putting down matting and other summer clothing instead of the hot carpets and all that sort of thing. My honorable friend from New York invited any Senator who had a reason for voting for this recess to give it. I did not volunteer my reason to him. It was only in obedience to his polite invitation that I gave it, and I think he ought to have accepted it with as much politeness. It was the best reason I had; indeed, it was the only reason I had. I have another one now, because it has been suggested to me by my honorable friend from West Virginia; but when a man gives all that he has he cannot be expected to give any more. I want to go home, and for that reason I want this recess of ten days.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I think some respect should be shown to the House of Representatives. That body has expressed a desire to take a week's recess, and on a question of this sort I think that respect, certainly, ought to be extended to the House. They have not been engaged in as fatiguing duties as have required our attention here from day to day; notwithstanding that members of the House ask this recess, and I suppose in part for the reasons suggested by the Senator from West Virginia. For myself, I will say that I feel like taking a rest from legislative duties of a few days. We have been confined here from day to day now for many weeks, and it has been the most fatiguing service I have ever been called upon to discharge—very much more fatiguing than the ordinary legislative duties which call us here; and I do not think really that the business that will occupy our attention will suffer by taking this recess. Although I do not expect to go to Chicago myself, I expect to go to a place very much dearer to me than Chicago; but if there are Senators or members of the House who wish to attend that convention my vote shall not be given to hinder them.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, I am inclined to favor this proposition, and for another reason. I appreciate the generosity of my friend from Indiana; but I think there is another reason, and I desire to present it here. My friend from Indiana is a candidate for Governor of Indiana, and he desires to visit his constituents. I am anxious to accommodate him also. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, if I supposed we could gain anything by remaining in session, I should be in favor of remaining; but usually at the long session we have to devote some little time to trimming up the Halls of the two Houses for the summer, and we shall be compelled to give some time for that purpose at all events. My experience also has been that, whenever these presidential conventions take place, those of us who remain are compelled to come here, and we find Houses so thin that it is almost impossible to do business, and we adjourn, sometimes for one day and sometimes for three days. In effect we shall gain nothing by remaining, in my opinion. I shall, therefore, vote to adjourn, and I may add that I shall go home (not to Chicago) whether the Senate adjourns or not.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I propose to vote against the adjournment, and for this reason: the House of Representatives, as has been stated, are very far ahead of the Senate in their business, and they have sent us several very important bills that are now before us. We had a report this morning from the Judiciary Committee in favor of the House bill for the restoration of Arkansas. The House has also sent us a bill for the restoration of five other States. I think we had better stay here and pass these bills. Besides, the House of Representatives have sent us a resolution which, unless amended, allows only that House to adjourn. If the members of the House wish to go to Chicago, I certainly am willing that they should do so. I take it there are very few members of the Senate who will go there if we adjourn, and it does seem to me that we had better stay here and attend to the pressing business before us.

It is said that it is necessary to trim up these Halls. I think this Chamber is well enough for us to finish this session in, and we can get along very comfortably in it. I think we ought to stay here and work every day until we do up the public business. Now, for two months we have been engaged in this trial, and we have a vast accumulation of business. It will take us two weeks at least to put ourselves even with the House of Representatives, and I agree with the Senator from New York that we had better stay here and do our work, and I shall so vote.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, one other consideration I want to mention. If we adjourn over ten days on account of the Chicago convention we can do no less on account of the New York convention, as a matter of course. Therefore an adjournment until next Monday week, as proposed, is equivalent to an adjournment for twenty days, nearly one month lost, and here we are on the eve of summer.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, my experience is that legislative bodies like Congress always adjourn about the same time, no matter what has happened previously during the session, and I have no doubt that we shall get about as early an adjournment if we pass this resolution as we shall get without it.

As to the point made by the Senator from Indiana, as I understand, there is nothing in it. The gentlemen of the minority, in either House of Congress, do not contemplate asking an adjournment in the month of July. This is the time when the adjournment ought to take place. It is the usual time. It is asked by the House of Representatives, charged with the initiation of money bills and of business generally. I perceive no reason why we should not accept it. I do not believe that the session will be protracted or that public business will be delayed by accepting it.

Members know very well, with reference to a very large number of important questions, that they cannot be settled this year. They will necessarily go over until the next session of Congress, and until after the people of the country have, to some extent, expressed their deliberate opinions upon them. All that we can expect during the present session of Congress is some measures of palliation and of financial convenience. While the two Houses are taking this short recess of a few days, and their Halls are being prepared, the business members of each House, who prepare the work in committees and who mature bills and measures of legislation, will be engaged in that duty to a great extent. There are a few men always in each House who may be classed as working men, who do not desire to go home, and who devote themselves to the preparation of business while the others are absent in the case of such an adjournment as this.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, it is said that the House of Representatives is much in advance of the Senate in the business of the session. The House of Representatives I conceive to be a proper judge of its own business, and it has concluded that that business is in such a condition as to allow it to take the recess proposed. It is not a proposition for both Houses to adjourn; it is a proposition that the Senate agree to a recess on the part of the House. What possible objection can there be to it?

Mr. ANTHONY. It always comes up in that form, and we always amend it. We certainly could not think of parting with our friends of the House and letting them go unless we go also.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was not anticipating that. As the proposition stands, I can see no possible objection to it. Let the House take their recess if it is true that they are in advance of the Senate in the business of the session, and then I should hope that the Senate might find it convenient to stay during the week and transact some business. As the resolution stands, I see no objection to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the House of Representatives is not in advance of the Senate in business. The House is behind the Senate: that is to say, the business which must be originated in the House before it comes to us is a great deal behind. The House will have a bill under consideration five or six months, send it over to us, and then because we do not pass it in a fortnight they say they are greatly ahead of us in their business. I think the business before us is more nearly closed up than the business before the House. The Senator from Maine, who is at the head of the Committee on Appropriations, knows that his business is nearly closed up. So I think he told me the other day. He suggested that he had nothing to bring up. I move to amend the resolution in the usual form so as to apply to both Houses. The Clerk has the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island will be read.

The amendment was read. It was to insert after the word "adjournment" the words "of the two Houses;" so as to make the resolution read:

That at the adjournment of the two Houses on Saturday, the 16th instant, a recess be taken until Monday, the 25th instant.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not generally favor adjournments, and ordinarily vote to economize time; but I doubt very much whether if we now continue in session without any adjournment we shall expedite the transaction of business. Every member of the Senate feels to some extent exhausted by the excitement and length of the trial which has just occurred; and the mind of every Senator is filled with the subjects connected with that trial; and it appears to me that if the Senate now adjourn for a week our bodies and our minds will be relieved and refreshed, and we can come back here at the expiration of that time and transact more business before the 1st of July than we shall if we continue in session. I do not urge this resolution for the purpose of accommodating persons who desire to go to the Chicago convention; but that convention will be in session, and it is of such consequences in the country that it will attract the attention of Senators, and of other persons who are interested in the political affairs of this country, and that matter will, to some extent, absorb our attention. And then the continuance of this trial until the 26th instant keeps that subject, to some extent, before our minds if we remain here, and will occupy, no doubt, a large share of our discussions.

I understand that it has been customary at this season of the year to adjourn as proposed by this resolution, and I can see no particular reason why we should depart from the precedent in this respect. I think we shall do as much business if we adjourn for a week as we shall if we continue in session, for some of the members will necessarily be absent attending the convention, others will be thinking about the proceedings of the convention or about this trial, and the business of the Senate will drag itself along here for a week or two, and we shall not succeed in doing very much. In view of all the circumstances, as well as the necessity of refurnishing the room, I favor this adjournment, and hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am sorry to disagree with my friend from Oregon, because it usually turns out in the end that if I do I am wrong; but we have here now on our Calendar three hundred and ninety-nine matters depending in the regular order of business. This, of course, is exclusive of resolutions and joint resolutions, and is exclusive of all matters that lie upon the table. It is simply the regular Calendar. Now, I do not see why we cannot, for the week to come, supposing the House of Representatives to adjourn itself—it does not concern us particularly—go forward with the regular ox-work (if I may be permitted to use a country term) of legislation and endeavor to forward business so as to get an early adjournment or an early cessation of business before the hot weather comes on. Here is work enough on our tables, certainly, to occupy us, selecting from these four hundred cases those upon which action is indispensable, matters of detail, matters of ordinary legislation of one kind and another, action upon which is practically indispensable to the orderly progress of affairs. A large portion of this business has been sent to us by the House of Representatives already: why should we not act upon and dispose of it when we have nothing else really to do?

These considerations press upon me heavily that we ought to make some diligence in disposing of this large mass of business, and I do not know any better time when we have something to do than to do it now. It is true a political convention is to be held; it is true that the question of impeachment is not disposed of; that the minds of Senators and others are to some extent interested in those questions; it is true that we have postponed the question of the final determination of the matter that is before us in order to give judges an opportunity to make up their minds—all that is true; but here we have now upon our table a press of legislative business upon which we ought to act, upon which we can be as ready to act to-day and Monday and through the next week as at any other time. Therefore, Mr. President, it appears to me, speaking, of course, only for myself, that we had better take hold manfully of this great arrear of business and try to bring it up.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I am clearly of opinion that our constituents are already disgusted at the number of adjournments we have recently had, and I think that as the majority with which I am identified are responsible for these adjournments it is high time that we began to look them in the face. If we adjourn now for one week, we then have a precedent for adjourning for the New York convention. We know that the fall campaign will occupy the attention especially of members of the House of Representatives who are to be reelected, and we know the interest that Senators will take in that campaign, and consequently we are to have a short summer session. The result of an adjournment now is to cut off the maturing and consummating of private bills and bills of a local character, dearer to some of our constituents than matters of general legislation, and more needed in their estimation. It is on our part, therefore, I think, a relinquishment of the private bills and bills of a local character to take this adjournment now and the consequent additional adjournment which will follow hereafter. For this reason, as the summer session must necessarily be short, I am utterly opposed to an adjournment at this time. I am especially opposed to that adjournment from the fact that the reconstructed States of which we have talked so much, and in whose introduction here we are undoubtedly so deeply interested, are waiting at our doors to be admitted; and when a bill for their admission shall pass it has to run the gauntlet of the veto, and we do not expect its return here under ten days from the time of its consummation, and then it is to be passed over the veto again, as has been the history heretofore. Consequently, if we are to admit these States at this session, it is high time that we act upon the question, and act promptly. Every interest that appeals to us as individuals and as representatives of the party that is responsible to this country for its legislation at the present time imperatively demands that we be found at our posts continuously until we adjourn for the session.

As to putting the Hall in better trim for the summer, I see nothing in that suggestion. If we remain here now, we shall have a session of but perhaps six weeks, and there is no remodeling necessary either for our comfort or our health. In no view which I can take of the question can I see any reason whatever why we should adjourn now after the repeated adjournments we have so recently had, and which have worked out such marvelous results as they have in the consummation of the vote of this morning.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is, Mr. President, one suggestion which I think I ought perhaps to answer. It is that if an adjournment be now taken for a week a like adjournment will be asked for when the Democratic convention sits in New York. I think I may say for my friends of the same political faith with myself that we shall desire no adjournment for the purpose of attending the New York convention. We think that convention will be able to take care of itself without any aid from us. I will suggest, further, that in the last Democratic national convention, it was refused by the convention to allow special attendance on the part of members of Congress in that body; so that we should hardly feel free to go unless we were delegates appointed by the people, so strict is the convention likely to be. So I think I may say that there will be no desire to take a recess at that time; as far as I am concerned, there will be none; but at this time I do desire that there should be a recess.

There is much more zeal to-day for the transaction of public business than there was last Tuesday. We all had to remain here during the week because the court of impeachment had adjourned over to this day. It was suggested, and very earnestly suggested, on Tuesday, that we might meet from day to day and transact ordinary business, such as was not much contested, but yet we adjourned from Tuesday of this week, I think, to to-day, spending three days in this city with no profit to ourselves or the country. Why this zeal just now to go on with work when there was such a disinclination in the early part of the week? I think, sir, there is no impropriety in taking this adjournment, the usual one which enables the employés of the Senate to put the Hall in condition for the pleasant transaction of business thereafter.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if there is any one subject upon which the Senator from Indiana ought not to ask any of us to attach the slightest importance to his opinions, it is in reference to what will or will not be required at the New York convention. According to the almost universal testimony of the newspapers, the Senator from Indiana, on that occasion, is to be "in the hands of his friends." [Laughter.] He is to do what they think it best he shall do; and no adjournment will be asked then, nor will the asking of an adjournment be omitted upon any counsel or advice of his. He will doubtless be in the hands of a committee, and not in a condition to influence that question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator is very much mistaken about all that.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, sir, the wisest and best of men have thought, as the Senator now thinks, beforehand, that they would be adequate to judge upon such an occasion, and experience has demonstrated the fallacy of that idea.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about this resolution. The Senator from Indiana says that there is great zeal just now to proceed with business, and he seems to think that all those who feel it have in some way experienced this zeal since Tuesday last. I beg to say to the Senator, for one, that his indisposition on Tuesday last to adjourn was no greater than mine. I speak for myself; the adjournment of Tuesday last did not take place by my vote nor by my accord in any way. I thought we should have gone on and improved the time, as I think we should now go on and improve the time.

I suppose this resolution is to prevail. The personal convenience of one Senator in one direction, and another in another, always enters so far into the average expression of judgment upon resolutions of this sort that such a proposition always starts with immense advantage and immense chances of success. If the purpose of the resolution had been to gangle the ingenuity and invention of Senators in debate I think it would be admirable, because we have seen a large assortment of reasons produced here in favor of adjournment, and I wish to submit that if there be one more utterly preposterous than all the rest it is that an adjournment is necessary to deck this Chamber in the habiliments of summer. In the first place, I should like to know how it concerns the convenience of anybody to have this carpet taken up now (staring and uncomfortable to the eye as it is at all seasons of the year) any more than it has done any other day during which we have sat? But, sir, I have a prejudice, an inveterate prejudice, against this suggestion, because I have heard it in the other House until it has become so hackneyed, it has served so many years, as every member of that House knows, as a mere make-shift, a mere stereotyped excuse for every gentleman to assign who does not care to assign his own personal convenience as the reason of his vote. Now, I undertake to say that everything which will be done in this Chamber in the way of change between winter and summer appointment and decoration, can be done just as well in the adjournment that takes place from Friday until Monday as it could be in a time as long as it took to fight the Trojan war. There is no doubt about it. What is there to do here? Take up this carpet and put down matting; and, forsooth, we are to adjourn ten days for that!

Mr. President, with great respect to every Senator, I say we all know better than that. If we want to adjourn in order that we may go home for our convenience, according to the example of those men described in Scripture who had each his personal errand to do on that day, let us say so and adjourn, but do not let us put it on this ground—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Any ground.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana, accommodating as he always is, is willing to put it on that ground. I knew that all the time. He wants to go home, like my friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] whom I heard declare that he meant to go home, and no doubt he is determined to go home at all events; and I suppose on the principle that "misery loves company" he would like the rest of us to go home because he does. Let every Senator go who wants to do so; and if the House of Representatives, having enjoyed a substantial relaxation, want to go, let them go, but let us stay here now on the most opportune of all occasions and do up that business, be it more or less, which remains and pertains to us.

The honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] went into some distinction which I did not understand to show whether, philosophically and metaphysically, we were before or behind the other House in the advance of legislative business. I take the practical fact that here lies bill after bill of that description which we cannot fail to recognize and to entertain, complete so far as the action of the House is concerned, and awaiting our action. Now, I submit to my honorable friend that it is perfectly idle to say that the House may have dawdled over these measures six weeks or six months; they have finished their consideration, and here they are—appropriation bills among others—for we are not so far up in that regard as the Senator suggested; and then there are the bills relating to the admission of the southern States. It is a work of time, it is a work of gravity, and before this session comes to an end we must consider them. Now, why should not gentlemen go who have, I have no doubt, paramount and obligatory reasons for going? but let the rest of us, who choose to stay here and make a quorum, carry forward the business of the session, so that by and by, when our convenience and the convenience of all parties concerned requires it, we may be discharged without day from this Chamber and permitted to return home before the hot season really commences.

I hope, Mr. President, that if this resolution is to pass it will be put on the real ground; but I trust that Senators will accept as a compromise the option of going themselves, which they will be able to do without breaking up a quorum, leaving those who choose to remain to make such progress as they can with the business of the session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say but a single word on this subject. Personally it makes very little difference to me whether the Senate takes this recess or not; but the public interests do require that some legislation should be transacted. I reported this morning from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill for the recognition of the State government in Arkansas. Those newly-organized State governments have no validity until they are recognized by Congress. I understand that there is now a Legislature assembled in Arkansas, which has ratified the constitutional amendment and has complied, as the committee thought, and as the House of Representatives, which sent us the bill, thought, with all the provisions necessary to authorize its recognition. If that is to be done, it ought not to be delayed for two or three weeks. The Legislature in Arkansas should not be kept at Little Rock waiting to hear from Washington; and if it is not to be recognized, let that be decided. They are entitled to a decision upon that question.

I think that bill ought to be taken up and disposed of. I believe that the public interests require it; that the peace and good order of the people in the State of Arkansas require it. We have been struggling here for the last two years to have governments organized in the rebel States; complaints have come here from time to time of disorder and violence; and now after a great deal of difficulty, after a convention has been called in pursuance of our law, after two elections, one a vote of the people calling a convention, after that convention has met, has adopted a constitution, and the people have voted upon it, and we have got their returns, we stand here and adjourn over the session perhaps for ten days at this season of the year, and take no action on such a bill. I think we should not adjourn until we act on that bill. I should be glad to take it up to-day and act upon it; and I do not know that there is any reason why we should not take it up to-day; but at any rate I think it would be a hardship that would hardly justify us, unless there is some imperative necessity, in adjourning Congress for ten days and passing over a measure like that. I speak of that because it is a measure that I have been looking into since it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. There are other measures, I have no doubt, of equal importance requiring the attention of Congress. I shall therefore vote, not to accommodate my personal convenience, but as a matter of public duty, against an adjournment that postpones the public business of the country.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who thinks we show a great deal more zeal now in favor of attending to the public business than we did two or three days ago, when we had immediately pressing upon us a great question, that I have an earnest and special desire to stay here and to take up two or three very important bills; and the events that are transpiring about us make me more earnest in that wish. I desire to see the bill for the restoration of Arkansas to her practical relations to the Union passed at the earliest possible moment; I desire also to see, further, the bill which restores five other southern States passed; and I should like to see them passed within the next three or four days, so that those States that have made and voted upon constitutions and elected officers can put the rebel officers out of power and put loyal and true men into power, and aid in restoring peace and order and law and liberty and justice in that portion of the country. For that reason I am specially anxious that the Senate shall stay here, and, as early as possible next week, pass these bills. Then we have two or three very important appropriation bills before the Senate, some of which, I think, will take two or three days. I think we had better now go to work in sober earnest and pass these measures, and make the Senate as far advanced as the House of Representatives in business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Illinois, and also to the Senator from Massachusetts, whether they think it is right to present to the President of the United States very important bills upon contested questions while there are articles of impeachment held over his head in the Senate. Is the President placed in such an independent position at such a time as he ought to occupy when, under the Constitution, he comes to consider a legislative measure presented for his approval or disapproval?

I can say to the Senator from Illinois and to the Senator from Massachusetts that I am as desirous as they can be that the southern States shall, in some way or other, pass into some other form of government than that which now rules them. No subject of greater importance can occupy the attention of the Senate, in my judgment. I will read an extract from a letter that I have received within a few days as illustrating the kind of government that is now prevailing in ten of the States. I read from a letter written by an old friend, an early friend, a young man who was raised in the same town with myself, who was always a Republican, who went into the war, commanded a company, fought it through, and then remained in Alabama, not as a "carpet-bagger," to obtain office and to filch from the people their hard-earned gains, but as a lawyer, to practice his profession in the town of Selma; and of the condition of affairs down there he writes me thus:

"This week seven citizens of Green county, who were tried by military commission at this place on the charge of assault and battery and an attempt at riot, were sent to the Dry Tortugas, four of them for one and three of them for three years. I will send you a paper containing the order of sentence."

And then he goes on to give an account of still another trial that is in progress there, in which he fears his client will fare still worse than these seven who have already been banished. Why, Mr. President, under the present form of government in these States we have gone back to the days of Rome and of Greece, when a system of punishment was allowed in those enlightened countries that is revolting to the civilization of the present age—the punishment of banishment—of banishment to a horrible island, where there is no green thing to look upon, where the hot sun of an almost torrid zone beats down upon the unfortunate victim. To such a punishment men are now subjected for an assault and battery with an intent, as it was averred, of committing a riot! Sir, while we have such a system of punishment as that, of course I feel the great necessity and importance of some change. Scarcely any change can be worse than that.

Again, as such frequent allusions have been made in the Senate to wrongs committed upon the freedmen in the southern States, I will read a short extract from the Chronicle, published in this city—a telegraphic dispatch of last month. It says:

"This evening at four o'clock, John P. Howard, a one-armed ex-confederate soldier, was shot from his horse and instantly killed, about four miles from this city, on the Burnsville road. The assassin has not been apprehended. This is the fifth white man that has been murdered in that immediate locality since the war. No one of the murderers has been arrested."

Murders without arrest, without trial, without conviction—murders of white men going on unpunished! Of course I am as anxious as any Senator to favor any just and proper legislation that will pass away from such a system of government, and adopt some other better and safer system for the people.

But, Mr. President, I think when it is proposed to send to the President of the United States a bill to reorganize the government of a State, and in connection with that bill there is a proposition which every Senator must know is bitterly contested—the proposition that Congress, by legislation, shall make irrevocable and unchangeable some feature of a State constitution—when such a proposition is sent to the President of the United States it ought to be under such circumstances that he can, without let or hindrance, exercise his judgment upon the measure. It may be that it will command the approval of his judgment. It may be that it will not. Whether it does or not, it ought to be sent to him when there is no legislative or impeachment sword pending over him; it ought to be when, in the spirit of the Constitution, he can consider it and communicate to the Senate and the House of Representatives his matured, unbiased, unfettered judgment upon so important a question; and I submit to Senators if this is not the very period of all the periods in our country's history, when we ought not in hot haste to pass a bill of that sort and send it to the President for his approval or disapproval. Let the measure wait. There has been no such haste in the past three years for restoring the southern States to representation in Congress as will now justify a demand that we shall consider that bill immediately. There has been a very earnest demand in this country that there should be representation from those States, and it has been delayed from month to month and year to year; but now we are told that because a peculiar and special measure has come before Congress, a delay of but a few days may work great damage to the country. Sir, I do not feel it so. Although I desire to pass from the military government that prevails down there into some other form of government, yet I desire that it shall be under such circumstances that the Senate can deliberately and in the proper spirit consider the measure which is brought before it; and also that the President of the United States, in the spirit of the Constitution, may be enabled to consider it without any embarrassment.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in the little experience I have had in this body I have found it but very little use to oppose an adjournment, either for a single day or for a week or ten days. When that mania pervades the body it is useless to resist it. I do not think that the question of adjournment is so material at this time, and I would not have said a word if it had not been for the extraordinary remarks of the distinguished Senator from Indiana, who has just taken his seat. On no occasion, where it is at all consistent with his sense of propriety, (and his is as keen as anybody's,) does he let an opportunity pass to arraign the Congress of the United States for their action for the last two or three years on this question of reconstruction; especially does he regard it as important now, as there is a very important convention to convene now, and within a month or so another important convention.

I sympathize with the Senator from Indiana in the sufferings of his friend's client at the Dry Tortugas. But, sir, there have been more flagrant outrages than that committed in those States; there have been crimes before which that pales into a simple misdemeanor, that have not aroused the sympathies of the other side of this Chamber. Those crimes are legion, and they have been going on for the last three years, while Congress has been struggling with all its power to prevent them, meeting at every step of the way the unmitigated opposition of the distinguished Senator from Indiana and those who act with him from the day that the measures were instituted to the present time. Now, the honorable Senator is moved with a holy sympathy because these military tribunals have convicted some men. What was the charge? Assault and battery with an attempt to kill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No.

Mr. NYE. What was it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. With intent to commit a riot.

Mr. NYE. That is just as bad; for we know that "riot" means "murder" there. I am not judge in that case; neither is the distinguished Senator from Indiana judge in that case; but when we are told here that one hundred and fifty-three persons have been killed in the State of Texas since Hancock assumed command and obeyed the directions of the Commander-in-Chief of these United States there is no sympathy awakened in the breasts of gentlemen on the other side by those terrible outrages.

Mr. DRAKE. Many more than one hundred and fifty-three.

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir. When we are told by citizens of the southern States that they are literally wading through blood, spilled by the men with whom the honorable Senator and his compeers act, it arouses no sympathy on his part. His sympathy is only excited when some military tribunal, rightfully or wrongfully, may have convicted a man and sent him to the Dry Tortugas. Sir, Indiana and its borders have been a little unfortunate with its inmates at the Dry Tortugas. They got one man from a neighboring State that the Dry Tortugas would not have—a prominent candidate, a leading man in the Democratic party, who "went to his own and his own received him not." [Laughter.] There is a holy horror in that region for the Dry Tortugas. I will tell the honorable Senator the remedy. Do nothing that you deserve to go there for, and let him advise his constituents to do nothing that they would deserve to go to the Dry Tortugas for, and they will not go there. Sir, what does "riot" mean in the South now? It means murder.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Organized assassination.

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir; organized assassination. It means the outrages of your Ku-Klux-Klan, by means of which the man who is clothed with the habiliments and garb of an American citizen is compelled to find hiding-places in your mountains and to run for his life, and on every turn he meets the Ku-Klux-Klan or the left wing of the Democratic party. They are the skirmishers of the Democratic party. They are the living rebellion that now exists. No sympathy is roused on the honorable Senator's part by the wrongs thus committed. He can sit calmly by and laugh at the idea of the Ku-Klux-Klan while every inch of the highways is reddened with human blood. But it is colored blood there generally, that is not quite as red as the blood of the honorable Senator's constituent who goes to the Dry Tortugas. Sir, I am sick of this paltering with this thing.

But the honorable Senator in conclusion, in a spirit peculiar to himself, and with a manner as meek as a cross between Job and Moses, [laughter,] tells us that it is not just to the President to send any bill to him that will embarrass him. Oh, no! The honorable Senator has reached a point now, and from the height on which he stands he can see nothing that should bear any possible phase of embarrassing the President who has embarrassed the nation for three years more than the honorable Senator can remedy with all his power.

I have no particular reason that operates on my mind to vote for an adjournment to save the tender feelings of the honorable Senator on this score; and I guess Mr. Johnson will take care of himself. Amid those by whom he is surrounded, and the new recruits that he is getting daily, he will take care of himself. Oh, how tenderly we ought to regard him! Oh, how tenderly has he regarded these southern States! Sir, these military tribunals would not have been sitting there now had the honorable Senator's President joined himself with us in perfecting these laws of reconstruction. I am not quite content, even after the vote of to-day, to take that gentle whipping over the head which the honorable Senator has seen fit to administer. Oh, what a gushing of humanity he has over the Dry Tortugas! Sir, I am sick of it. If the honorable Senator is in earnest and wants to get the State of Arkansas in, why did he oppose it the other day? What was the necessity of referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary to observe the high rule of form?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is ready now to be passed.

Mr. NYE. It has come quicker from there than anything else ever did, [laughter,] and would not have come now if this peculiar pressure had not been put on; there would have been kinks in it, and somebody would have wanted to send it back. But, sir, as an offset, we have got the report. Why not act upon it now, this minute? and then I will vote to adjourn with the honorable Senator.

But he says he never can consent to have a constitution so framed in any particular that it cannot be altered. Would the honorable Senator consent to have a constitution framed that permitted the idea of putting slavery again into one of these States? Would he rewrite the history of the wrongs of the past; or, in view of the impending danger, would he not provide in the strongest possible terms against there ever being a reënactment of those wrongs?

But the Senator tells us it may embarrass the President. Sir, I think a little embarrassment would not be unprofitable to him. He ought to be embarrassed. Ever since these reconstruction measures have been started, not one of them has met with the favor of the distinguished Senator from Indiana, not one provision of them has he voted for; but as constant as the sun is to its position every hour he has gone with the President of the United States in obstructing not only their passage but their execution; I mean that he has done that by sustaining the President in every vote that has been given upon these questions; and, sir, the records of the Senate will show it.

I therefore am led to doubt the sincerity of these men when they seek to put off this measure upon some little quibble. Let Arkansas come in to-day. Let us have one birth with a death. Let us have some offset; and I do not know of anything that would make me feel better than to see a State that was dead and buried resurrected again in the spirit of the law that Congress has passed. Sir, it should be the duty of Congress before it adjourns to rebaptize, by virtue of its own law, the State of Arkansas into the Union. Though her sins be as scarlet we will make her whiter than snow. That is the business we had better be engaged in to-day instead of talking of adjourning for any convention. She is here, washed clean in the laws of Congress. She stands here to-day with her garments purified. Let her come in.

I hope that the honorable Senator whose sympathies are so moved in view of the outrage that he claims has been committed, will be the first to join with us, even though there be some little technical objection, in rebaptizing the State of Arkansas; and before we adjourn I hope it will be done. We have had work of destruction enough. The work of rebuilding has now commenced. Let us put the first corner-stone in to-day, upon which the structure will be rebuilt and firmly stand. Let us do one thing in vindication of Congress, instead of adjourning out of respect to the embarrassing position of the President. Sir, I would have begged him on my bended knees, not only for months, but years, to stop embarrassing the progress of Congress, but he would not. He would not hearken to the charmer, charm he never so wisely. He was as deaf as the adder to the cries of suffering humanity in the South; deaf to the cries of the murders of the whites; ay, sir, and, in my judgment, upon the evidence particeps criminis to the most terrible slaughter that ever this earth has seen, under the sanction of law, in New Orleans; and yet, in deference to the sensitiveness of that man who dared to charge that massacre back upon this body and the other branch of Congress, we are asked to postpone this measure. No, sir; we can postpone it in deference to no man's sensibility; but in obedience to the law of eternal justice, in obedience to our own mandate, we bade the Senators and Representatives from Arkansas to come here. They are here, and we should admit them.

I can relieve the honorable Senator of his embarrassment in regard to sending the bill to the President. There is no use of sending it to him. Let us pass the measure as a concurrent resolution, which does not need his sanction, and that will relieve him from embarrassment and admit the State of Arkansas at once. I am sensitive, too. I do not want the bill to slumber at the Presidential Mansion for ten days and come back ridden by another veto. We have had a series of them and a series of experiences from which we should learn. If we send the bill for the admission of Arkansas to the President, after keeping it ten days, he will throw it back defiantly into our faces, hoping and expecting that we shall be unable, under the peculiar circumstances, to pass it over his head; and then Arkansas will lie at your doors where she is waiting; but that arouses no sympathy in the distinguished Senator's mind.

Now, Mr. President, I hope we shall not adjourn. I hope that before the sun goes down to-night we shall admit Arkansas, or put the bill for her admission through all the forms that are necessary. Let the President have another sweet morsel to roll under his tongue. Let him veto it and we will meet it. For one, sir, I should deem it discreditable to Congress to look in the face of these men whom they have bid come here, while they are subjected to further exclusion.

I rose simply to say that I desire to enter my protest against the common and usual practice, upon every motion to adjourn, to arraign us here and before the public, just before the adjournment, as being engaged by any possibility in any scheme to keep Arkansas or any other State that is ready to come in out of the Union, or that we desire to perpetuate for a single hour the military tribunals in Alabama. Sir, Alabama would have had no tribunal of that kind to-day within her borders if the Democratic party from Maine to California had not advised their rebel friends there to resist the adoption of the new constitution; she would have been safely within the folds of this Union and here to-day; and I protest that the honorable Senator from Indiana is estopped from bringing up these tears of sympathy as prejudicial to the opposing party, at least upon that score. Therefore, sir, I insist upon it that before we adjourn we shall pass the bill for the admission of Arkansas. The President, I think, will waive the peculiar circumstances which he is in and admit her. I have no doubt the message is written already.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to lay the resolution on the table, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Cole, Connors, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Williams—26.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Fowler, Grimes, Howard, and Thayer—4.

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "two Houses" and inserting the words "House of Representatives," so as to make the resolution a mere consent that the House of Representatives may adjourn if they wish to do so.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is just what they sent us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not at all certain that that is the construction of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I submit that the proposed amendment to the amendment is not in order. It is simply putting the original proposition over again. It cannot be in order to offer the same thing that we have before us already as an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order. It is an amendment to an amendment. It will be reported.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask for the reading of the original proposition and the amendment, and also the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution of the the House of Representatives is as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That at the adjournment on Saturday, the 16th instant, a recess be taken until Monday, the 23th instant.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "adjournment" the words "of the two Houses."

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] proposes to amend the amendment by striking out the words "two Houses" and inserting "House of Representatives;" so that, if amended as proposed, the resolution will read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That at the adjournment of the House of Representatives on Saturday, the 16th instant, a recess be taken until Monday, the 23th instant.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to my friend from Vermont that if the House of Representatives is permitted to adjourn it will defeat the passage of the Arkansas bill, because we could not perfect it; nor could we perfect any bill; it would be impossible to have the bill signed and become a law. So far as that measure is concerned, it would be just as much defeated by the House adjourning as if both bodies adjourned.

I wish to say one word in reply to the Senator from Indiana—I do not see him in his seat, however—who objected that it was improper to send bills to the President, under the circumstances, while these articles of impeachment are pending. That state of things has existed for two months. That objection would stop all legislation. I do not think that can be the intention.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I believe I have uniformly voted against what are called adjournments over and recesses. I do not recall an instance in which I have voted for them. I shall, however, vote for this, and I am moved to do it from a consideration to which the Senator from Illinois has called attention. The Senator alludes to the President of the United States, and reminds us that he is on trial before us. He also goes further, and reminds us that during the protracted trial we have been in the habit of receiving messages from him and transmitting messages to him. He makes no criticisms upon that conduct. I have always felt from the beginning that it was unworthy of the Senate. I have always felt, from the first moment he was arraigned at our bar, that it was unbecoming the Senate to continue to transact business with him. I have felt that it was the same as if the judge on the bench should continue to transact business with the criminal in the dock, or, if the Senate prefers that term, with the culprit in the dock.

However, Senators thought otherwise. The trial proceeded. The evidence and the argument are now closed. Nothing more remains except the judgment of the Senate. And now, between the closing of the case and the judgment of the Senate it is proposed that the Senate shall continue its former relations with the accused President, inviting messages from him and transmitting messages to him. I object to the proceeding. I object to it as unworthy of the Senate.

If business can be transacted and sufficiently matured without communication with the President, possibly the Senate might proceed with its consideration; and yet all must see that it would proceed under a certain constraint, knowing that it ought not to communicate with the President at this time. I submit the conscience of the Senate ought to rise in judgment against any such communication. Profoundly believing the President of the United States guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors—and I have now no hesitation in declaring it, for I have voted to-day on one important article—having that proof and conviction, and knowing that there are other articles which still await the judgment of the Senate, how can I, as a Senator, consent to continue in communication with him on important public business?

It may be, when these proceedings are brought to an end, that he may come forth with a nominal acquittal by one vote. Condemned by a majority of the Senate, as he has already in advance been condemned by two thirds and more of the House of Representatives, and, as is unquestionable, condemned by the great body of the American people, it may be, I say, that he may go forth from this Chamber with a nominal acquittal; but he must go forth as a blasted public functionary. That is his inevitable destiny. But until that acquittal is entered of record, I think the Senate will consult its own character by abstaining from any further interchange of messages with him. It is therefore that I shall vote for the proposed adjournment till the week after next, that public business involving communications with the President may not be sandwiched between the different stages of our judgment.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it is now nearly or quite three months since the articles of impeachment were found against the President by the House of Representatives, and during that time the Senate has continued to do official business with the President; and it is rather too late now to talk about protecting our conscience or our dignity by not doing business with a President who has been impeached. Sir, it is a vain proposition. We are now on the very approach of summer; a vast amount of important business remains unfinished, and if we do not attend to our business, and do what the country requires should be done, we shall have a settlement to make. The business of this country cannot be allowed to suffer on account of the punctillios referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts; and, as we have gone on for three months transacting business with the President, it seems to me too late in the day to argue these punctillios.

There has been no reason offered as yet for this adjournment. I understand that the effect of the amendment is to allow the House of Representatives to adjourn while the Senate remains in session. I protest against any proposition of that kind. Let Congress remain here, not simply one House. If anybody needs recreation it is the Senate, and not the House of Representatives. They have had but little to do for the last four or six weeks, while we have been almost constantly engaged here; and yet I am satisfied that neither our health nor anything else requires that we shall adjourn over for a week or ten days. The pretext that we must adjourn for the purpose of having these carpets taken up and the fleas shaken out, it seems to me, amounts to nothing. These fleas will get into somebody's ears and leave the carpet if we do not stay here and attend to our business. [Laughter.]

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I am opposed to this adjournment, but for a reason different from that which was offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] in favor of adjournment. It is also different from that offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I wish to send to the President of the United States precisely such a bill as that to which the honorable Senator from Indiana refers—a bill with a proviso that none of these rebel States which are hereafter to be admitted shall deprive any person made in the image of God of his equal rights. I wish to send him such a bill as that. I wish to send it to him in the interim between now and the final vote upon impeachment. I wish we could send him any proposition in favor of human liberty. I wish we could send him any measure for the relief of the suffering people of the South. I wish we could send him any measure which would go to protect the loyalists of the South, any measure which would stay the tide of crime and assassination there; so that we might have for our Republican colleagues, our Republican friends, a new veto upon human rights and upon the best interests of our country.

I thank the honorable Senator from Indiana for his sweet reminder as to the action of the President of the United States when he shall not have the ghost of impeachment before him; when that order which he laid away until after the trial of the impeachment can be acted upon; when the President of the United States with his Adjutant General and Secretary of War, Lorenzo Thomas, shall have power in this country. Sir, we shall then find that no republican measure, no measure which will bring these States into the Union on the reconstruction policy of Congress, or upon the true policy for the prosperity and happiness of the Union, will ever receive the sanction of the President of the United States, and never again, I fear, receive a constitutional majority of two thirds over the veto message which he will send here to Congress.

I should not have referred to the subject at all but for the sweet reminder of the Senator from Indiana. I believe in some respects it would be as well for Congress to adjourn and for members to go home and breathe the breath of popular opinion among their constituents, and understand how a great people feel outraged and indignant at the verdict which has been pronounced here to-day on this most important trial.

But, sir, I cannot favor an adjournment. There is important business before the Senate. There is the business of the Committee on Territories, whose business is not advanced at all, and of other committees. I shall therefore vote against this adjournment. I trust that in the meantime we shall be able to hear from the country and feel the effect of popular opinion. I do not mean upon the votes of members; but I mean if that opinion can in any way influence our decision, it will be for the best interest of the country.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I voted against the adjournment of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment for the reason that we had been in session as a court of impeachment for six weeks or two months, the trial had been concluded, every Senator had formed his judgment, every Senator was present, and we were in the process of pronouncing the judgment of the court in the case which had been tried—a case of great interest, which has attracted the attention of every Senator and weighed upon him for a long time. But a majority of the Senate concluded to adjourn, and to adjourn over until the 20th instant. I thought it was an unheard of thing in a court in any civilized country before; but it may be that the majority is right and that I am wrong in the views which I have of it.

But, inasmuch as the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, have determined to adjourn, it seems to me it would be better that the Senate, as a Senate, should also adjourn. I shall not go into the question as to what considerations may have moved gentlemen to adjourn the court of impeachment; but it seems to me, that being the very important, pressing business which was upon us, and we were just ready to come to a conclusion upon it, if there were any reasons which should adjourn such a weighty and pressing matter as that the reasons are still stronger for putting aside, for the present, at all events, these other matters.

Besides, sir, we need not discuss the fact that this convention which is to sit at Chicago during the coming week will engross not only the public mind, but will engross, to a very great extent, the attention of the Senate as well as of the House of Representatives. It will be very doubtful whether upon any contested question a quorum of the two Houses will be present in the transaction of business; and, practically, it seems to me we may as well consent to the adjournment which the House of Representatives have asked. While I have opposed the adjournment of the court and wished to close that business—and had it been closed I would have voted against the adjournment of the Senate—yet, under these circumstances, the court having been adjourned just as it was in the conclusion of a most important matter, I now consent to give my vote for the adjournment of the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a single question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. POMEROY. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to say that he thought it to be an unheard of thing for a court to adjourn while it was rendering its verdict. If I recollect rightly, the Senator from Wisconsin voted in the court to adjourn over until July, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I voted for an amendment to the proposition to adjourn. If we adjourned at all I proposed to give a long adjournment, so that we could do business in the meantime.

Mr. POMEROY. Then it would not be an unheard of thing to have a long adjournment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If we were to have any I preferred a long one.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Wisconsin voted for an adjournment to July, when it was an unheard of thing with him for a court to adjourn for a week!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I voted to adjourn sine die also. I am still willing to vote to adjourn it altogether.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I have no feeling upon this question of adjournment. I do not care what the Senate does upon that subject. I am utterly indifferent upon it. But, sir, I do object, under a motion to adjourn, to Senators taking occasion to comment upon the action of their associates here in another capacity.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] says that he never before voted for an adjournment. I believe I can bear him witness to the truth of his assertion, if he needed any, that never since I came here has he voted for an adjournment upon any occasion, scarcely ever willingly until after five or six o'clock in the afternoon, but never for any length of time. I do not think I ever knew the Senator since I have been in the Senate to vote for an adjournment sine die, even in July or August.

Mr. SUMNER. Never.

Mr. HENDERSON. Never, I believe. If the Senator had his way he would remain here forever and ever. [Laughter.] Never would he leave this body; and, as a Senator says, I suppose he would have some objection to leaving this world even.

Now, Mr. President, I do not see any use in some of the remarks made by the Senator. For instance, he said that the President, a great criminal, had been acquitted by one vote, and that that matter now had been adjourned over, and that while that adjournment was pending he wanted to have no communication with him whatever, notwithstanding some of the Senators here desired to have it. Mr. President, I have no more communication with Mr. Johnson than has the Senator from Massachusetts. I have not seen Mr. Johnson since January last. I have had no personal communication with him, and desire to have none, especially until we get through with this trial. As we have adjourned the court, and the Senator voted for it, and thereby made an excuse for his voting, against his custom, for an adjournment of the Senate; inasmuch as this thing has occurred, partly by the Senator's own fault, is it not wrong, in the midst of this trial, to comment upon the action of other Senators or to make any reflection upon the accused? It is enough to do it in our capacity as jurors and judges. I do think that we should abstain from it while in the Senate. If nothing else requires it, a decent self-respect should demand it. That is my opinion, and I express it freely, not that I have any sympathy with the political course of Andrew Johnson; for I abhor it as much as the Senator from Massachusetts does. But the question presented to my conscience is not a political question under the articles of impeachment. I have to find according to the law and the evidence; and no Senator in this body has a right, either in the Senate or in the court, to reflect upon my conduct or upon the conduct of any other of his associates on that subject.

If the question of political action is to be brought into consideration, then I have the same feeling in reference to the political conduct of Mr. Johnson that the Senator from Massachusetts has. I have no doubt that we should agree on that point; but that is not the question.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] desires that we should adjourn this body and go before our constituents and snuff the breeze that we will there find prevailing. Why? Will that enlighten us in the discharge of our duty under the obligations of an oath? Perhaps it would be well, upon the trial of a great crime, to turn the jury loose from their rooms in the court-house and let them snuff the breeze in the court yard; but the Senator from Illinois, I apprehend, would not advocate such a policy. He desires that we should adjourn this body and go among our constituents and ascertain what is doing there, and let the voice of our constituents come up and enlighten us in the discharge of our duty.

No man has a higher regard for his constituents than I have for mine; they have been generous and kind to me; and no man loves them better than I do, I presume, or has a higher degree of confidence in their judgment; but, Mr. President, they cannot enlighten me on this subject. I hope they will not desire it. They can enlighten me on all political questions; but this is not a political question. It is one that appeals to my conscience; it is one that I am bound to decide according to the charges as framed by the House of Representatives and according to the law and the evidence adduced upon them; and I have felt it my duty, so far as I possibly could, to decide justly, and having decided I am in the hands of my constituents, and if they object to my decision I tender most freely the resignation of the place that I now hold. Sir, I would not hold this place here to violate the obligations of an oath at the dictation of all the people of this world; and all the reflections that can be cast upon my conduct, all the opprobrium that may be heaped upon me now, and all the odium in the future that the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Illinois, or all the Senators that ever existed, or ever can exist, can cast upon me, shall not drive me from the discharge of an honest duty. I like this place as well as the Senator from Massachusetts; and perhaps the time may come, when I have been here as long as he and grown so great as he, if that be possible, that I may possibly desire to sit in my chair day and night and never adjourn, as he does. But, sir, I do not love it so well, nor shall I ever love it so well as to forget the obligations of duty when they are imposed upon me by the solemnity of an oath.

Now, sir, I have said this much; and I do hope that from this day to the end of the trial we shall hear no more reflections of this character, and that when we leave this body after the adjournment we shall be able to go before the people in the coming canvass as we would have done if this trial had not occurred, and not be told that this is a great political or party question. Sir, the institutions of our country are involved in it; the construction of the Constitution is involved in it; the construction of the laws upon our statute-books from 1789 down to the present day is involved in it; and I am not to be told that my duty as a politician or partisan requires that I shall turn my back upon the honest convictions that I entertain upon the construction of the Constitution and the laws of the land. Sir, there is no use of such talk as this. We can leave here, as we have been, friends. There is no use of exciting party hatred against any man. There is no use of claiming that this is a party question, for it is not; and the day that our party shall commit itself to the awful proposition that a man, in order to be in full standing with it, must be perjured before God and man, that day the party crumbles, as it ought to crumble, into the dust.

I love the Republican party as well as my friends. I expect to act with it, notwithstanding what may be said of my course here. I have not lost my fealty to it. Newspapers may say that I am an apostate; newspapers may demand that I take my place in another party; but that requires the consent, I apprehend, of another; it requires at least my own consent; and that consent, so far, has not been obtained. Sir, I expect to act as I have ever acted in the discharge of duty; and if I vote to acquit the President upon every charge, as I expect to do now, unless I shall change my mind, I yet have not lost my party fealty, for it is no party question; and I expect to go from this Chamber in the discharge of my party duty as I would have discharged it if this case had never been brought here; and I have ever regretted that it was brought here. It never should have been; or, if brought here, it should not have been under the charges under which it is brought. That is my judgment.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senate desires to adjourn, let it do so. If it desires to remain, and perhaps that would be the better policy, the President is not yet convicted,* and we must have intercourse with him. If the Senator from Massachusetts desired none he ought to have gone on and voted on the other articles this morning. We are bound to have intercourse with him. We must send our bills to him if we remain here. The strong probability is that when we again meet—or the possibility is, if any Senator objects to the term “probability”—the possibility is when we meet again he will be acquitted, and then we must have intercourse with him from that time on.

The Senator from Illinois speaks of bloodshed in the southern States. I do not see much of it. But have we not majorities in all those States now? We have the Legislatures; we have the Governors; we have constitutions securing equal rights. If these are not sufficient, if the President commits any wrong in the future, if we find bloodshed there, I will go with my friend as far as he dare go on that subject. We have that all secure.

Mr. WILSON. You have when you pass these bills; not till then.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why not sit here, then, and pass them?

Mr. WILSON. I am for that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then the Senator has no objection to having intercourse with this “great criminal?”

Mr. WILSON. I am in favor of sending them to him.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is in favor of sending the bills to the President. The Senator does not seem to be in danger of becoming a leper because he sends a bill to a man who is not yet convicted. The Constitution requires that he shall be convicted by two thirds of the Senate, and until that conviction takes place the law presumes him innocent. Therefore we need not think that we do very great harm to ourselves or to the institutions of the country by sending bills to him. Let us then go on and pass these bills. I have no objection to that. I want them passed.

As regards this idea that the South is suffering so much, as I have before stated, our friends are able to vindicate themselves with these majorities in their behalf; and if not, what is General Grant about? Has he not the Army at his command? The President cannot issue an order except through him. If he has not men enough at his command, can we not give him more? I will go as far as any man toward raising troops for the purpose of placing them in the hands of General Grant to protect the people of the South.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But that act is unconstitutional, the President says.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the President ever interfered with the act? Has he done any act in contravention of it? Does the Senator now say upon his honor as a Senator that the President has ever interfered with it by act.

Mr. HOWE. What act?

Mr. HENDERSON. The act requiring all orders of inferior officers to go through General Grant.

Mr. SUMNER. Is it not in evidence that he tampered with an officer of the United States?

Mr. HENDERSON. Why, Mr. President, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. Directly the reverse.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not say that the President has interfered with that particular act. I do not propose to enter into that question. I only suggest to my friend when he alludes to the power of General Grant that the President of the United States has declared—there is no dispute about that—that that act is a plain and palpable violation of his rights, and therefore I thought it right to suggest to my friend himself, not in the way of complaint, but to suggest to his mind whether there was not a difficulty in relying a great deal on General Grant on that point.

Mr. HENDERSON. General Jackson thought the Bank of the United States unconstitutional.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And he removed the deposits accordingly.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, he removed the deposits accordingly. Chief Justice Marshall, in the Supreme Court of the United States, thought it constitutional. The Senator from Vermont believes the tenure-of-office act to be constitutional. So do I. James Madison, equal to either one of us—not superior to the Senator from Vermont, but very far superior to me—thought that this act was unconstitutional.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He thought both ways.

Mr. HENDERSON. He never thought but one way that I know of. The Senator perhaps has a little more intimacy with his opinions than myself. I never heard of an opinion of Mr. Madison on that subject on the other side.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then my friend is not as well informed—I feel obliged to confess at the expense of vanity—as I am, for the evidence of history shows Mr. Madison on both sides on that identical question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Perhaps my friend from Vermont, if he lives to be as old as Mr. Madison, will be on the other side of this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps so; we will wait and see about that.

Mr. HENDERSON. The mere fact that the President of the United States thinks some law is unconstitutional does not prove that he is going to interfere with the law. That does not follow as a matter of course. But let us see whether he does interfere with the law or not. I am willing to give General Grant all the troops that he demands for the protection of the people of the South; and I will vote for such a bill to-day if there is any necessity for it.

Now, Mr. President, I have said just so much in vindication of the course which some of us thought proper to pursue upon the trial of this case. It would be better, I suggest to Senators, to let the proceedings of the court alone when we are legislating, and when we are in the court to let legislation alone.

Mr. DRAKE. Before my colleague takes his seat, I should be very glad to make an inquiry of him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] give way?

Mr. DRAKE. He has given way, sir. I was not aware that any Senator here had in the session this afternoon assailed my colleague on account of his action in the court of impeachment.

Mr. SUMNER. Nobody.

Mr. DRAKE. Will my colleague state if anybody has so assailed him, because I wish to assure him that his honor is quite precious to me, and I should like to know who it is that ventures to assail the honor of my colleague. I ask for information of my colleague who it was that assailed him?

Mr. HENDERSON. Is my honor so precious in the eyes of my colleague that he will take care of it under all circumstances, let me ask?

Mr. DRAKE. I have generally been accustomed for several years past, at home and among our people, to take care of the honor of my colleague, and I am prepared to do it now.

Mr. HENDERSON. No further than I have taken charge of his, I apprehend. I reciprocate the sentiment. Mr. President, if there was nothing intended by the remarks of Senators to reflect upon the action of their Republican colleagues in the vote cast a little while ago, then, of course, what I have said is not pertinent. If I drew an erroneous inference, there is no harm done. If, however, I be correct, then I hope my colleague will, as he has always done, be ready and willing to vindicate me. Inasmuch as he has risen and given me the assurance upon this occasion, I am perfectly willing to leave my honor now in his hands.

Mr. DRAKE. And, Mr. President, I am perfectly willing—

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana rises to a point of order. He will state the point of order.

Mr. MORTON. I rise to a question of order that ought to have been made some time ago; and that is, that the impeachment trial not being over, but being simply adjourned to another day, it is not proper, in my judgment, to assail members of the Senate for having voted one way or the other, or to make a justification of votes that may have been given. I think on either side it is premature and improper.

Mr. DRAKE. I suggest, when the Senator rises to call another Senator to order, that he do it at the time when the disorderly words are spoken, and not undertake to take another Senator off the floor who has not done any such thing in order that he may make his point of order. I merely rose to make the inquiry that I did of my colleague; but I must confess my very great surprise that my colleague, under the supposition that some general aspersion had been made upon the seven Republican Senators who voted this morning for the acquittal of the President, should have felt that it called upon him individually to defend himself from that general aspersion.

Mr. HENDERSON. There was a remark made by one Senator, at least, that the Senate ought to adjourn, that they could not afford to have any intercourse whatever with this great criminal that the Senate had voted to acquit this morning. That was the statement.

Mr. SUMNER. I certainly never thought of the Senator from Missouri except in kindness, and in the few remarks I made a few moments ago I beg to assure him I did not have him in my mind, nor did I have any Senator in my mind. But listening to the Senator, he will pardon me for saying, I was reminded of a maxim which comes up often in the language of another country, and which seemed to me to be very applicable to his case as he presented it. It is this: “Whoso excuses himself accuses himself.” The swiftness with which he rushed to self-defense brought to my mind this ancient maxim. It may not be at all applicable; still it did occur to me. That is all I have to say with regard to the remarks of the Senator.

But I now go further and repeat what I said before. I said that I did not think it was becoming in the Senate to continue an interchange of messages with a person accused at its bar; that it was the same as if a court should send letters and transact business with a prisoner in the dock. So it seems to me; and on the present occasion the impropriety is increased, I may say that it is aggravated, when we consider that we are in the midst of our judgment. A vote has been taken on one article of impeachment; but there are ten others which remain to be acted upon; and on the one article upon which the vote has been taken, as Senators well know, the acquittal was only by one vote. There is a familiar saying that a man is saved by the skin of his teeth; and so to-day on that eleventh article the President was saved by the skin of his teeth. He was saved by one vote. I called it a nominal acquittal. There is on that one article—I do not now allude to the others, but I freely allude to that because it has been acted upon—a moral judgment against him, a judgment—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire what decision the Chair made on the point of order made by my colleague?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not make any.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I ask for a decision on the point of order as applicable to the argument now being made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator to note down the words which I have used to which he objects. That is the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is objection the words must be put in writing.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator objects, I ask him to put in writing the words to which he objects.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I make the point of order that the line of argument of the Senator is not in order. I am not making a point of order on particular words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No discussion is in order until the words objected to are put in writing. If the Senator objects to words used in debate they must be written down.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not objecting to words. I am objecting to an argument that does not relate to the subject before us, but is a criticism on the judgment of the Senate sitting in another character. I want to know if the Senator from Massachusetts has a right to review the judgment of the Senate sitting in another character, on a motion to adjourn?

Mr. SUMNER. I made no review and no criticism about it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it was.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire—

Mr. SUMNER. Have I not the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A question of order has been made, which must be decided before there can be any argument.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You are not in order until the other question is decided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a point of order pending which must be settled by the Chair without further debate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On that point of order I wish to make a suggestion.

Several SENATORS. Debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not debatable. The Senator from Indiana objects to the course of argument pursued by the Senator from Massachusetts. I know of no rule that dictates how a man shall speak or what course of argument he shall pursue in this body. He has the whole range of his own imagination, [laughter,] and the Chair is no judge of the relevancy to the point in question of his argument. The question now is on adjourning the body.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, my argument is simply this—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I object to being interrupted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I rise to a question of order, and I desire to state it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will state his point of order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My point of order is, that the rule does not require the words to be taken down, unless it be a personal matter between Senators.

Several SENATORS. That is not a question of order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Massachusetts demanded that the words should be taken down. I desired to make that suggestion to the Chair, and rose for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. That has been disposed of.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Disposed of or not, I desire to make the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has disposed of the question of order that was up.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the remarks of my friend from Wisconsin were not very much to the point.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will excuse me now. I shall be through in one minute, and then he can have the floor as long as he pleases.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not ask to take the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor, and must not be interrupted unless a point of order is raised.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I have stated my point, and that was all I desired. I do not wish to argue it; but I was trying to say that under the peculiar circumstances of this case, with this great trial pending, with the judgment on one article carried by only one vote, and with the judgment on ten other articles still pending, it was not becoming in the Senate during this period to continue to transact business with the accused at our bar. I do not know how it impresses other Senators; but I have a sentiment that all such relations are indelicate and improper. I know that there are Senators who, since the impeachment of the President has been agitated, have continued in personal relations with him. I have understood that there are some who have sought official appointments at his hands, and some who have frequented his house. I have no criticism for them. I could not have done it myself. But now I am not speaking of what individual Senators should do, but of what the Senate should do; and on that point it seems to me all should unite, whether, like myself, they believe the President guilty, or, like the Senator from Missouri, they believe him not guilty. It seems to me that all equally, during the pendency of this judgment, should feel that it was unworthy of the Senate to continue this interchange of messages.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have voted so as to indicate that I did not want an adjournment. I have listened to this debate, however, and I am satisfied that we had better adjourn over, and for the reason that the legislation which is pressing upon the country is so intimately connected with the questions involved in this impeachment that it is manifest from what has been said that at every step we shall discuss it, not incidentally, but on its merits. From the time the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] alluded to the position that the President would be in if a bill were now sent to him until the Senator from Massachusetts has taken his seat, the subject-matter has been either directly or indirectly connected with this great trial. I simply wish to make this further remark: it has been said here that this was a purely judicial question. From that—

Mr. WILLEY. I rise to a question of order, and I can do so now with propriety.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia will state his question of order.

Mr. WILLEY. My question of order is, that the subject of impeachment and the trial is out of order to be alluded to in any manner or form in any discussion on any question on this floor while sitting as a Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is clear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule limiting debate or the range or course of debate that any Senator may take on any question. It is left to his own sense of propriety.

Mr. JOHNSON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the question of order be reduced to writing, so that we shall know exactly what we are voting upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear what the decision of the Chair is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The decision of the Chair is, that in the Senate of the United States there is no limit to debate, and no course of debate can be dictated by any questions of order or rules of order recognized by this body.

Mr. STEWART. Am I at liberty to inquire what is the point of order? I have not alluded to the merits of impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia raises the point of order that any allusion to the trial is out of order. If particular words are objected to, the Senator must put the words in writing; but he objects to the course of debate making allusions to the impeachment trial; and the Chair decides that that is in the discretion of the Senator upon the floor, and therefore the member is in order in alluding to that or anything else that he thinks proper to illustrate the reason why we ought to adjourn or not to adjourn. The Senator from Maryland appeals from that decision, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest to my friend from West Virginia that perhaps he has not the exact point made by the Senator from Nevada, if I can have the indulgence of the Senate to make the statement. The Senator from Nevada was pursuing an argument, as I think, germane to the question. It was that we cannot discuss any of these bills without being involved in the discussion, directly or indirectly, of the impeachment question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There can be no debate on any subject except upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator from Nevada, as I understood him, was proceeding to depart from that line of remark, and to say that one thing he must controvert; that it had been said on this floor that this was simply a judicial proceeding; and he was going on, as I understood him, to discuss the reason why it was not a judicial proceeding, and in doing so must necessarily enter more or less into the merits of the case.

While I am up I beg to say, with all possible respect for the Senate, that it is shocking to my feelings, in my capacity as a Senator, aside from our obligations as judges under oath, in any manner or form to involve that question within the line of our remarks or criticisms or consideration.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. I have not yielded the floor. I want to know whether I am in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the very question before the Senate. The Senator will take his seat until that is disposed of.

Mr. HARLAN. I rise for the purpose of asking the Senator from West Virginia to indicate what rule of the Senate he thinks has been violated, in order that it may be read at the Secretary's desk before I record my vote. I know there are rules on this subject. There is one which prohibits allusions to discussions in the House of Representatives, and I think there is another rule that restricts improper use of language in relation to the President of the United States; and there may be some rule in the code that governs this body that has been violated here. If so, I should be glad to have the Senator from West Virginia indicate it in order that it may be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Iowa will pardon me, I think he is mistaken in supposing there is anything in the express rules of the Senate which provides against alluding to the House of Representatives or its action or to the President of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. We cannot hear the Senator on this side.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say I think the Senator from Iowa is mistaken in supposing there is anything in the express rules of the Senate as written on the topics to which he has alluded. That rule rests in the general principles of parliamentary law and propriety, just as the objection of the Senator from West Virginia, if a sound one, rests.

Mr. MORTON. I will inquire if a motion to adjourn is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MORTON. Then I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Let us settle this question first.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, let us have the question on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON. I misunderstood what had fallen from the Senator from Nevada, and, therefore, withdraw the appeal.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, let us have the question on the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a single remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal from the decision of the Chair is withdrawn, and the Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I was about to remark that I wholly dissented from the position that this was an ordinary trial, only involving judicial issues and consequences. If there had been any doubt on that point this discussion, which immediately took a wide range, involving the admission of the States and the reconstruction of the States, and the condition of the people of the South, alluded to by all the Senators who had taken part in the discussion, calling for the reading of accounts of military trials in the South, and replies of assassination, &c., shows me most conclusively that if we are to discuss with any freedom the great question of admitting these new States, we must be at liberty to survey the whole field; and I should feel exceedingly embarrassed, in view of my ideas of the propriety of this case, in getting upon the floor to discuss it as I think it ought to be discussed. Therefore I am thoroughly satisfied that we should adjourn. So far as the propriety of discussing these questions now is concerned I fully concur with the Senator from West Virginia; but I say I am trammelled from the range this case must take when the bill is passed and the veto comes to us, which we must discuss; because, when that veto comes, as we have had a warning that it will come, we must then discuss it in all its bearings. We are in no condition to do so now. I hope the Senate will adjourn until the final action on the impeachment.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Oh no. Let us vote.

Mr. CAMERON. I withdraw the motion if a vote can be taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will not occupy the time of the Senate; but inasmuch as I have moved an amendment; I think I have a right to say one word in favor of it. The amendment is based upon the idea—

Mr. CAMERON. My motion to adjourn is before the Senate. I merely waived it in order that the vote might be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator to withdraw his motion.

Mr. CAMERON. Only for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will put the question on the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken in supposing that he did not withdraw his motion. I am sure I heard him say that he withdrew it.

Mr. CAMERON. I withdrew it for a special purpose, to let the vote be taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But my friend from Pennsylvania cannot withdraw a motion to adjourn conditionally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a mistake about it. The Chair supposed the Senator withdrew his motion, but if he says he did not the Chair will put the question. The motion is that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, now if there is no pending motion but my amendment I will say a word upon it. The amendment is based upon the idea that if we are to pass this resolution at all it shall be passed only in such a form as shall permit the House of Representatives, if it sees fit, under the Constitution to take this adjournment that it wants, and still leave this body to go on with the great amount of business that it has in hand and perfect it.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] will permit me to say in this connection that it does not necessarily imply any communication with the President of the United States one way or the other. There are a dozen important bills upon your table, sir, that will need days and days of work to bring them into a state of perfection to send them even to the House of Representatives. There is, therefore, no necessity for an adjournment over on the ground that we must necessarily communicate with the President, if that were an objection. I do not enter into that because it involves other considerations to which I do not wish to allude.

Then the question simply is this: the House of Representatives are desirous, for their own purposes and for reasons which we are bound to suppose are good to them, to adjourn for a week; and they send a resolution here which, it is said, is intended merely to ask our consent. The language of the resolution is a little vague because it does not say which House is to adjourn. Now, my proposition simply is that if we are to pass it at all we shall confine it to the House of Representatives as it was said it was intended to be. That is my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] to insert after the word "adjournment" the words "of the two Houses."

Mr. CONKLING. So that if this amendment prevails both Houses are to adjourn?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to inquire if the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives only provided for the adjournment of that House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That appeared to be the import of it.

Mr. MORTON. And the amendment proposes to extend it to the Senate also?

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Williams, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Coaling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Thayer, Tipton, Willey, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, and Howard—5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, as amended,

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Harlan, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, and Howard—5.

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the deficiency bill of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 16, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NIBLACK was granted indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The following message was received from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

May 16, 1868.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, sitting for the trial of the President upon articles of impeachment, is now ready to receive them in the Senate Chamber.

Attest:

J. W. FORNEY,

Secretary.

By W. J. McDONALD,

Chief Clerk.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and Door-keeper.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At one o'clock and twenty minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; and the respondent has been declared to be not guilty on the eleventh article, by a vote of 35 in the affirmative to 19 in the negative; and that then the Senate, sitting for the said trial, had adjourned until Tuesday, the 20th instant, at noon.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is, thirty-five voted he was guilty and nineteen that he was innocent?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. ARNELL, Mr. BECK, and Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania.

ACTION OF THE MISSOURI DELEGATION.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to what I suppose is a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution:

Whereas it appears by the following letter, purporting to have been written and addressed by seven members of this House to one of the Senators of the United States, which is published in the daily National Intelligencer, published in the city of Washington, to wit:

WASHINGTON, May 12, 1868.

Sir: On a consultation of the Republican members of the House of Representatives from Missouri, in view of your position on the impeachment articles, we ask you to withhold your vote on any article upon which you cannot vote affirmatively. This request is made because we believe the safety of the loyal people of the United States demands the immediate removal of Andrew Johnson from the office of President of the United States.

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. ANDERSON,
WILLIAM A. PILE,
C. A. NEWCOMB,
JOSEPH W. McCLURG,
BENJAMIN F. LOAN,
JOHN P. BENJAMIN,
JOSEPH J. GRAVELLY.

Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, United States Senate.

that an indecent and corrupt combination of the Representatives aforesaid has been entered into to improperly influence the Senator aforesaid in his judgment and decision in the impeachment now pending and undetermined in the Senate: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed to investigate the matter of the writing of said letter, the motive and purpose of said members in writing said letter, whether the same was written to corrupt or improperly influence the judgment and decision of said Senator, and what action the House ought to take with reference thereto, and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers,

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin presents it as a question of privilege, under the rules and the usage of the House.

Mr. COVODE rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the question, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will suspend until the Chair decides the question. The evident object of the language of this resolution is to charge that the letter written by the Representatives from Missouri to their Senator appears to be an indecent and corrupt combination of the Representatives aforesaid, but without a direct charge to that effect. In the opinion of the Chair it is not a corrupt combination, and the Chair will state the reasons for his opinion.

If the conversations and the interviews between members of the House and those representing the same State in the Senate in writing are corrupt, then the same conversations in regard to matters pending before the Senate sitting as a court orally are corrupt. If the gentleman from Wisconsin had charged directly that that was a corrupt combination, the Chair would be disposed to submit the question to the House for them to decide whether it is or is not a question of privilege, as the rules allow him to do in doubtful cases, and he intends to do it, even as the resolution reads. In the opinion of the Chair it is not a corrupt combination. There does not appear on the face of it anything corrupt in its character.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is the very inquiry we desire to have made, so that the members may be exculpated or convicted, as the facts warrant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, although the resolution says "it appears" corrupt, the gentleman does not charge directly, on his responsibility as a member, that the writing of such a letter is corrupt.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the letter shows the character.

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine. The Chair will submit the question to the House itself, whether this is or is not a question of privilege, as the rule on page 154 of the Digest authorizes him thus to submit it.

Mr. BLAINE. Is it in order to move that the resolution be not received?

The SPEAKER. The first question is whether it is a question of privilege. If the House should decide that it is, then the rule to be found on page 77 of the Digest would operate, namely: Will the House now consider it? But that question cannot be raised until the House decides whether it is or is not a question of privilege.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call for the reading of the rule to which the Speaker referred.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule which authorizes the Speaker to submit the question to the House, on page 154 of the Digest. The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"And when a proposition is submitted which relates to the privileges of the House it is his duty to entertain it, at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege."

Mr. BLAINE. A single question, if it is in order. I do not know whether I understood the resolution correctly. Does it charge that there is an indecent and corrupt combination?

The SPEAKER. "It appears" is the language.

Mr. BLAINE. I suggest whether it is competent for the gentleman to charge an indecent and corrupt combination? It seems to me it would be raising a question of privilege upon himself.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman will allow me to take care of myself. I do not make the charge any further than it appears in the letter. And the gentleman cannot intimidate me, either.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to ask the Speaker to restate the parliamentary law, as was done a few moments ago?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the letter referred to does not on its face show a corrupt combination. The fact that the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN,] when the question was before the House yesterday, stated that the letter was written at the request of the Senator himself, seems to exclude the idea that it was corrupt in its character.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That must be properly a part of the evidence.

The SPEAKER. It is a question for the House to determine, it having been stated in their presence.

Mr. VAN AUKEN. I would inquire whether the Chair has a right to argue against the question of its being a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a right, under the rules, to speak upon questions of order in preference to every other member—in preference even to the member from Pennsylvania; and he has the right to allude to what has occurred in the presence of the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. I understood the Chair to state that yesterday a member from Missouri stated that the letter was written at the request of the Senator from Missouri. Now, of course it is entirely proper for the Chair to make that statement, but—

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated it as a reason why he was of opinion that it did not present a question of privilege, but will be glad to hear the gentleman if he desires to make a statement.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to say that it was also stated at the same time, in answer to the statement of the gentleman from Missouri, that when these gentlemen worried the Senator from Missouri he asked them to put their names to the letter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was willing the gentleman from Pennsylvania should make his statement, as his recollection seems to differ from that of the Chair as to what was said in the House yesterday. It was said in the presence of the whole House, and is on the record of the House in the Daily Globe.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I wish the question may be stated by the Chair whether this is a question of the privileges of this House, because that is the question upon which we are to vote. We cannot vote whether it is a question of privilege for the Senate, but whether it is a question of the privileges of this House; and I hope the Chair will so state the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair held yesterday, in ruling on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] that the House had no power over the privileges of the Senate, nor would the Senate allow them to have any; nor have the Senate any right to interfere with the privileges of the House. But the gentleman from Wisconsin has so drafted the resolution as to have it relate to the privileges of the House. The question is, Will the House entertain the resolution as a question of privilege?

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 28, nays 82, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chandler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Marshall, McCullough, Morgan, Niblack, Phelps, Prayn, Robinson, Ross, Sistravies, Stewart, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Woodward—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Blaine, Blair, Boatwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, Moore, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Ramm, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Brownell, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Finney, Fox, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Kelley, Knott, Koontz, Laflin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, McCarthy, McClurg, McCormick, Mercier, Miller, Morehead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Munger, Newcomb, Nicholson, Pile, Pomeroy, Randall, Robertson, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—79.

So the House refused to entertain the resolution as a question of privilege.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Senate is now considering the concurrent resolution in regard to a recess.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope we shall proceed with the regular order of business until we hear from the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a brief personal explanation, not exceeding five minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Missouri the other day made an objection to me, and he has now refused to have the same subject come in as a privileged question, and I shall object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence after to-day was granted to Mr. STOKES, Mr. CLARKE of Kansas, and to Mr. LOGAN.

RECESS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WARD. I desire to inquire whether it would be in order to introduce a resolution recalling the concurrent resolution which was sent to the Senate providing for a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the time for reconsideration has expired. A resolution can be reconsidered upon the same or a succeeding day. The resolution can be entertained only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARD. Is not a resolution to recall that resolution from the Senate in order?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order if the State of New York were called regularly for reports; but it can only be offered at the present time by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARD. Then I ask unanimous consent. Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, and Mr. PETERS objected.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to give notice that on the next assembling of the House I shall move, as a question which has already been ruled to be privileged by the Chair, to withdraw the articles of impeachment, and another resolution expunging the impeachment proceedings from the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule on that question when it comes up.

Mr. ROBINSON. I only desire to give notice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not foreclosed by the statement of the gentleman that he has settled the question.

READMISSION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. JONES. I ask consent of the House to record my vote upon the bill for the admission of Arkansas, and upon the bill for the admission of North Carolina, South Carolina, and other States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES,] as he has stated to other members on many occasions, that the Chair cannot even ask unanimous consent for that purpose. The object of the gentleman can be attained only by suspending that rule entirely. The gentleman can state how he would have voted, had he been present, and his statement will be recorded in the Globe.

Mr. JONES. Then I will state that, had I been present when the bills to which I have referred were passed, I would have voted in the negative.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MUNGEN asked and obtained leave of absence for an indefinite period after to-day.

Mr. ELA asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence after to-day.

Mr. ROSS. In view of the onerous labors of my colleague from the Galena district [Mr. WASHBURN] during the impeachment trial, I move that he be granted leave of absence during the coming summer to travel in Europe, and that his expenses and mileage be paid the same as they were last summer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is not in accordance with usage for a member to ask leave of absence for another member, who is in his seat, except at his own request. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is present, and will doubtless make the request for himself should he desire it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will attend to my own affairs, and not call upon a Knight of the Golden Circle to attend to matters for me.

Mr. ROSS. I hope my colleague will take no offense. We all know that he was absent from the country last summer, and as he has had very onerous duties to perform of late I thought it but proper to give him leave to tramp for his health during the coming summer.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, the first business during the morning hour, which has now commenced, is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

No reports were made from that committee, and the Committee on Private Land Claims were called for reports.

LAND CLAIM NO. 45, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. ORTH, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported, with a recommendation that the same do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 1075) to authorize the adjudication of claim No. 45 in the report of the surveyor general of the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that it shall be lawful, at any time within two years after the date of this act, and not thereafter, for José Sutton, or any of his assignees or legal representatives, to commence proceedings against the United States in the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico, for the purpose of adjudicating the title to the land specified and embraced in claim No. 45 in the report of the surveyor general of said Territory, and on the records of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The second section provides that upon instituting such proceedings notice of the pendency thereof shall be given to and served upon the district attorney of the United States for said Territory at least thirty days prior to the first day of the then ensuing term of said court; and makes it the duty of said attorney to enter his appearance and defend the interests of the United States in and to the land embraced in said claim.

The third section provides that the court or courts in which said case may be pending shall be governed by the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the laws of nations, so far as applicable to the case, the laws, usages, and custom of the Government from which it is claimed that such title is derived, and by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as applicable; provided, however, that if the decision of the supreme court of said Territory shall be adverse to the title of such claimant or claimants he or they shall have the right at any time within six months after the rendition of such decision, and not thereafter, to take an appeal from such decision to the Supreme Court of the United States; and provided further, that if such decision shall be adverse to the United States then it shall be the duty of said district attorney, as soon as thereafter practicable, to take an appeal from such decision to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The fourth section provides that if no such suit be instituted within the time specified in the first section of this act said claim shall be presumed to have been abandoned, and said lands shall be held and deemed public lands belonging to the United States, to be surveyed and sold as other lands; provided, however, that if such proceeding be instituted and prosecuted as herein provided, and the title to said lands adjudged to be in such claimant or claimants by the Supreme Court of the United States, it shall then be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause said lands to be surveyed and platted at the expense of said claimant or claimants, conforming as near as may be in such survey to the surveys of the United States in said Territory; and said Commissioner, upon the return and filing in his office of such survey and plat, shall then issue a patent therefor to such claimant or claimants.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, this claim is one of a series of claims referred to the committee of which I am chairman, arising out of our Mexican and Spanish grants and embraced within the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. The committee have examined the claim and are not willing to recommend its confirmation by Congress, although its confirmation is recommended by the surveyor general of the Territory of New Mexico. The committee find what they conceive to be a glaring defect in the title, that is, that the grantee never took possession of the grant as required by the colonization laws of Spain and Mexico. We therefore provide he shall be authorized at any time within two years to file a claim in the United States court in the Territory of New Mexico for adjudication of this claim; we provide furthermore that the district attorney for the Territory shall enter his appearance to guard the rights of the United States in the premises. If decision is had in the case for the claimant or the United States provision is made for appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and when the Supreme Court of the United States finally decide in favor of the claim, then the Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized to issue a patent for it. I ask that the bill be put on its passage, and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ORTH moved that the accompanying report be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HELEN M. SMITH.

Mr. WELKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1076) for the relief Helen M. Smith; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

QUIETING LAND TITLES IN MISSOURI.

Mr. WOODWARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back House bill No. 237, to quiet doubts in relation to the validity of titles to four tracts of land in the State of Missouri, with a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it enacted, That the act of Congress entitled "An act in regard to claims in land within the State of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, and to institute proceedings to try the validity of claims," approved May 23, 1834; and the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of land claims within the States of Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana, and in those parts of the States of Mississippi and Alabama south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and between the Mississippi and Perdido rivers," approved the 27th of June, 1844, be, and the same are hereby, revived and extended for a period of five years from the date of this act so far as said acts relate to land claims within the State of Missouri, and proceedings may be taken and carried on under the provisions of said acts as to land within the State of Missouri with the same effect and in the same manner as if said acts had not expired by their own limitation.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, for the information of members I will state that the House referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims a bill having reference to four Spanish grants. The effect of that bill was to validate the title of the heirs and legal representatives of these Spanish grantees. The committee have investigated the subject as fully as the papers submitted to them would enable the committee, and are satisfied that the bill referred to them ought not to pass. They have great doubts on the exhibition made whether the legal representatives of these grantees have any title whatever in the lands they claim; but supposing they may have a title the committee are of the opinion the most they can ask from Congress is the revival of certain general statutes designed to give to all parties an opportunity to come into the courts of the United States and litigate their title. The bill, therefore, which is laid upon the table, and which I have reported by direction of the committee, has for its object the revival of two statutes—one passed in 1834 and the other passed in 1844—both of which have expired by their own limitations. Our bill has for its object the revival of these two statutes, in order that these legal representatives and all other parties may go into the Federal courts and test their titles, if, indeed, they have any in point of fact. The report fully explains the ground upon which the committee has proceeded.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where is the land located?

Mr. WOODWARD. In the State of Missouri.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOODWARD moved that the accompanying report be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODWARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DENNIS M'CANN.

Mr. HARDING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported that in the matter of the claim of Dennis McCann, based upon the charter of the United States, of the bark Charles Warner, the proper Department of the Government should be charged with its proper settlement, and that the papers and vouchers received from the War Department be returned to said Department, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was adopted, and it was ordered accordingly.

EDWARD D. ALLEN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent from the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill for the relief of Edward B. Allen. It merely pays him the full amount of pay and emoluments of a captain of infantry from the 18th of August, 1862, to 1st of November, 1862.

Mr. ROSS. That had better be investigated a little further, and I object.

CHARLES E. CAPEHART.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 473, for the relief of Charles E. Capehart. It has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was read in extenso. It directs the Paymaster General of the Army, out of any moneys in his possession appropriated for the payment of the Army, to pay to Charles E. Capehart, late captain of company A of the first regiment of West Virginia cavalry volunteers, the pay and allowances of a captain of cavalry from July 2, 1862, to March 1, 1863, after deducting from the amount of said pay and allowances any sums of money heretofore paid Capehart by the pay department for his services for that time; provided that Capehart present the usual certificates required by the rules of the pay department upon final payment of volunteer officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the motion to refer the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is that it be put on its passage.

Mr. CHANLER. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will make a statement of the facts in the case. The bill was passed by the Senate on a printed report which lies upon your table, Mr. Speaker, from a Senate committee, and the only point involved is this: Captain Capehart was mustered into the service by a colonel of volunteers, and he supposed, as everybody at that time supposed, it was a proper muster. But when he came to make his final settlement it was decided that a colonel of volunteers had no right to muster; that it should have been done by an officer of the regular Army. Therefore his pay was stopped because he was not mustered by a regular officer. He did duty, commanded his company, and was mustered, as he supposed, properly and regularly. We desire to cure that defect of muster. The colonel of volunteers mustered him in in good faith. There was good faith in the whole transaction. The bill is carefully guarded, so that nothing can be paid except for service actually rendered. It amounts to only three or four hundred dollars.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not object to this special case, but I do object to all special legislation. There are many cases exactly like this, and all ought to be provided for in a general bill. Every member who has had any experience in the Thirty-Ninth Congress knows there are many such cases.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from New York suggests we had better bring in a general bill. We thought it wise not to bring in a general bill on the subject. In the first place, a great many cases might get through under the terms of a general act which ought not to pass.

In the next place there are but few such cases. Indeed, the committee has never before had a case before it like it. This man was mustered in, but objection was raised that the officer was a volunteer and not a regular. This case, so far as I know, stands alone. If there are others they certainly must be few. We thought it safer, therefore, to pass a special bill, and if there be other cases let each stand on its own merits. Of course I would prefer general legislation if we could do it safely and not let too many cases through.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to object to this. On the contrary, I think it ought to pass; but I renew the objection of the gentleman from New York, and desire to say further that there are more cases of this kind. I have two cases exactly like it in principle before me. There must necessarily be cases where service has been actually performed by officers and no pay can be given. It is a most laborious and tedious process to make up a case and get it before Congress for special relief. It does seem to me to be necessary to have a general law, properly guarded, providing for the payment of officers who have actually performed duty, and are unable to receive any other pay than that of a private.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is now a general law that meets the case where a man was not mustered at all, or was not mustered until he had served more than one month. But this is a different case, in which, after the man was mustered, the muster was declared irregular. If the gentleman has the cases he mentions, and will send them to the committee, I have no doubt they will pass upon them in the same way as we have upon this.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. JUDD and Mr. MOORE.

HOTEL AT FORTRESS MONROE.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 286) to authorize the enlargement of the Hygeia Hotel at Fortress Monroe; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to grant permission to Henry Clarke, proprietor of the Hygeia Hotel at Fortress Monroe, to enlarge the site of the same in such manner as may be compatible with the interest of the United States, provided that such enlargement on any building hereafter erected by any person or persons on the land of the United States at Fortress Monroe shall be at once removed at the expense of the respective owners whenever the Secretary of War shall deem such removal necessary, and no claim for damages therefor shall be made upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. A bill was passed precisely similar in character to this, allowing another person to build a hotel on the grounds occupied by one recently burned. This stands on precisely the same merits, but we have added a clause to cover both this and the other case, that no claim for damages shall be brought in case the Government orders the buildings to be removed, and that they are to be removed at the expense of the owners whenever the necessities of the Government require it.

Mr. CHANLER. Does this pass any title to land?

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no; it simply permits the building to be erected, subject to removal.

Mr. CHANLER. Do the buildings remain liable to taxation?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose so; they are private property.

Mr. CHANLER. If we are granting privileges they should certainly pay taxes.

Mr. GARFIELD. We only allow them the privilege of putting up the building. When it is up of course it is taxable like any other building.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask whether Government property is taxable?

Mr. GARFIELD. This is not Government property. We only let the party use the land and put up a private building upon it, which is just as much taxable as any other private property.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope the gentleman will inquire into the fact whether under this bill this property would escape taxation. That is an important question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was put on the passage of the joint resolution, and no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Ross and GARFIELD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-nine, noes not counted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to add to the joint resolution a proviso "that nothing in this joint resolution shall exempt the property from taxation."

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Would it not be better to provide expressly that the property shall be subject to taxation?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I suggest the addition of this proviso:

Provided, That the building to be so enlarged shall be subject to taxation under State and national authority.

Mr. ROSS. You had better add the words, "the same as other property."

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to by unanimous consent.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Martha S. Woodward, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

STEAMBOAT PINE BLUFF.

Mr. JONES, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 267) to change the name of the steamboat Pine Bluff to that of Endora; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

O. P. SHIRAS.

Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1077) for the relief of O. P. Shiras; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROSS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATIVES OF AGATHA HUBER.

Mr. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1078) to grant a pension to the representatives of Agatha Huber, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

STEPHEN F. CARVER.

Mr. HUMPHREY also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1079) to grant a pension to Stephen F. Carver; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EDWARD B. ALLEN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1080) for the relief of Edward B. Allen; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Paymaster General of the Army to pay to Edward B. Allen, of the State of Indiana, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army, the full amount of the pay and emoluments of a captain of infantry from the 18th of August, 1862, to the 1st of November, 1862.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I call the previous question on the bill, unless some gentleman desires an explanation.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to know what object there is in passing a bill of this kind?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Let the report be read.

The report was read.

Mr. ROSS. I merely desire to make a suggestion. It appears to me that this is rather extraordinary legislation. This man, it appears, was elected captain of a company in Indiana, and went into the service; but he held the office of auditor in the meantime at home, and drew the compensation of auditor, and his patriotism was so weak that he was not willing to give up his civil office of auditor, and left the Army and went home for the purpose of retaining his civil office and receiving its emoluments. And after he got out of the office of auditor I understand that he went back into the Army as a private, and I suppose received his pay as such.

Now, it is proposed by this bill to give this man the compensation of a captain during the time that he was holding the office of auditor, a very valuable office in the State of Indiana, and also a portion of the time drawing the pay of a private in the service. It is stated in the report of the committee that this claim is put upon political grounds. As a matter of course there is no reasonable expectation that the House will refuse to concur in the request of the gentleman, as he has in his report appealed to party considerations.

Mr. Speaker, I have become tired and weary of these continual applications in behalf of the officers of the Army. They never appear to be satisfied with their pay. We increase their compensation; we give them additional compensation. And yet where is the man who has arisen in his place in this House and made application in behalf of the man who carried a musket on the field of battle? In my judgment it would be much wiser for the people to elect a few privates as members of Congress, and not have so many officers here; for then the interests of private soldiers would be looked after. But as it is now, with so many shoulder-straps here, only the interests of the officers are attended to, while the poor private is neglected. Of all the applications which have come before Congress, it appears to me that this is the least meritorious; for it proposes that a man may hold a civil office at home, may receive pay as a private, and then come here for the pay of a captain. And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] says it must be done for the good of the party. I hope my worthy friend will reconsider his views upon this subject, and in the future try to do something for the private soldier, who bore the heat and the burden of the day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I do not know whether the people of my district will take the advice of the gentleman, and send a private soldier here in my place. But I must say that if the advice should be recommended to his own district, and they should act upon it and send us even a private soldier, in my opinion the complexion of this House might be benefited thereby. I care nothing about whether shoulder-straps or private soldiers are here. This bill involves a question of right. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] misunderstands this case entirely. This man was mustered in service as a captain, went into battle and fought for the flag. The military authorities decided that he could not be a captain because he was the auditor of his county, and he was mustered out. The courts decided that he could not be auditor of the county, and then he went back into the service as a private. The courts of the State, being Democratic, decided that he could not be auditor, and prevented him from getting his pay as auditor, and he has failed to receive his pay as captain for the time he served as such. Now, all that this bill proposes is that this man shall receive the compensation he has earned. He commanded his company as captain, and served as such in the Army. The Committee on Military Affairs recommend that he be paid for that time and no more.

I now ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] to point to a case where a private soldier was spurned by our committee in favor of shoulder-straps?

Mr. ROSS. When I offered a proposition to increase the pay of the private soldier to twenty dollars per month.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Yes, twenty dollars in gold per month, knowing very well that it could not be done.

Mr. ROSS. No; in greenbacks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The proposition was offered for the very purpose of breaking down the Government by injuring its credit.

Mr. ROSS. Would it not have been as well for the private soldier to have a little of the gold, as for the bondholders to have it all?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Yes; but you do not reach me there at all. The nation's life was at stake, and the gentleman was willing to burden it with additional expenses in order to break it down by his proposition to pay twenty dollars in gold per month to each private soldier, knowing very well that it could not be done.

Mr. ROSS. The Government was not broken down by giving the officers two months' extra pay.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT L. LINDSAY.

Mr. PILE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1081) for the relief of Robert L. Lindsay; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It directs the Paymaster General to pay to Robert L. Lindsay, late of the fiftieth Missouri volunteers, the full pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 3d day of August, 1864, to the 30th day of November, 1864.

Mr. PILE. I will explain this bill in a few words. Captain Lindsay was appointed a second lieutenant and recruiting officer for the forty-seventh regiment of Missouri infantry, and ordered to report to the colonel of that regiment, Colonel Thomas E. Fletcher, now Governor of that State. By Colonel Fletcher he was ordered to Pilot Knob to fill up his company. Captain Lindsay proceeded to recruit his company, and just at the time when it was full the battle of Pilot Knob occurred. He went into that battle with his company, who were then not mustered into the service. He himself was not mustered in, save as second lieutenant and recruiting officer; but it was intended that he should be the captain of the company. In that battle the company suffered severely, losing a large number of men in killed and wounded. Captain Lindsay was complimented in general orders for his bravery on that occasion. The company was so cut up in that battle that it could not be mustered into service as a company of the forty-seventh regiment. Captain Lindsay went to work to fill up his company again, in another part of the State, distant from the headquarters of the forty-seventh regiment. That regiment was filled by putting in it another company. The company of Captain Lindsay, when again filled up, was transferred to the fiftieth regiment of Missouri volunteers, and he was mustered with his company into that regiment, and served with it as captain until the close of the war. Now, because of the fact that his commission as recruiting officer and second lieutenant was in the forty-seventh and not in the fiftieth regiment, where he finally served, the paymaster decided that he could not pay him as second lieutenant and recruiting officer for the fiftieth regiment for the time intervening between the battle of Pilot Knob and the period when his company was mustered into the fiftieth regiment. This bill is to give him his pay for that intervening time as second lieutenant.

My colleague [Mr. McCORMICK] is well acquainted with all the facts of the case, and I will yield to him to make a statement.

Mr. McCORMICK. This case is a very meritorious case. Lieutenant Lindsay had his company ready to be mustered into the forty-seventh regiment, and the mustering officer had been ordered to Pilot Knob to muster it in. The battle of Pilot Knob came on, and he went with his company into that battle. The company was so reduced in numbers by the casualties of that battle that it could not be mustered in at that time. It was some months before it was again filled up, and then it was mustered into the fiftieth regiment. Captain Lindsay only asks for pay from the time of the battle of Pilot Knob until he and his company were mustered into the fiftieth regiment. I think it is a just claim.

Mr. PIKE. I now call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PILE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN A. NEUSTAEDTER.

Mr. PILE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 1082) for the relief of John A. Neustaedter; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It directs the Paymaster General of the Army to pay to John A. Neustaedter, late a captain of artillery, out of any money now appropriated or that may hereafter be appropriated for the pay of the Army, the full pay and emoluments for a captain of artillery in the Army of the United States, from March 25, 1862, to August 28, 1862.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] why it is that this man has not received his pay as an officer if he was in the Army?

Mr. PILE. I will state the facts of the case if it be desired.

Mr. ROSS. If there be a report let it be read.

Mr. PILE. I have no formal report, but I will state the facts and the official orders upon which they are based.

Mr. Speaker, while Major General Frémont was in command of the department of Missouri, as is known to all gentlemen who understand the history of that command, a large number of provisional commissions were issued to various officers in that department. They served under these commissions until some time after General Frémont was removed from that department, and were paid by the disbursing officers or paymasters of the Army. After his removal an order from the War Department mustered out all such officers as were not specially retained by order issued from competent authority. All these officers under that order were discharged, and there was quite a number of them, twenty-five or thirty of them, I do not know the number exactly.

Now, this officer was appointed on the 31st of August, 1861, by General Frémont, and he was ordered to Paducah, Kentucky. At the time of the issue of the order directing these officers to be mustered out he was serving as captain of artillery on the staff of General C. F. Smith, and he continued to serve until the latter date named in the bill. All the orders directed to him are here upon file and accompany the bill. They show that he was constantly under orders, and that he rendered service under them. Orders were issued to him as captain of artillery. He was chief of staff to General Smith and other officers. By some oversight in the order issued for the retention of officers his name was omitted. He was neither mustered out under the order mustering these officers out, nor was his name mentioned as of those who were to be retained. He knew nothing of the order for four or five months, he being in the field in good faith rendering service to the Government. He was in constant service and in receipt of his pay until it was discovered that his name was not among those who were retained.

Mr. ROSS. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PILE. Certainly.

Mr. ROSS. What authority had General Frémont to appoint a civilian as an officer?

Mr. PILE. I presume this order of General Frémont and this action of General Frémont appointing provisional officers was without any direct warrant of law. I know of no law giving him that authority; yet it was in an early part of the war when department commanders from very necessity issued these commissions, and the men to whom they were given entered upon their duty and did the service which their commissions called for, and the disbursing officers of the Government paid them. Nearly every department commander in the country exercised this authority and commissioned these officers, to a greater or less extent, so far as I know. I know that it was done at Memphis, at New Orleans, and at various other places, even at a still later period of the war.

This man, whatever may have been the technical authority, the legality or illegality of his commission, when issued under the authority of the department commander it was sufficient authority for him, and under it he entered the Army of the Union and periled his life, rendering good service to the country. Therefore, sir, I think he ought to be paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this man's commission was issued by General Frémont. Now, is not the gentleman himself aware of the fact that a great many of the men to whom commissions were issued by General Frémont during the hundred days he commanded in the West never rendered any service at all? Does he not know that Mr. Simon Stevens, appointed to the commission of major, and Mr. K. N. Corwin, of Cincinnati, Ohio, holding a still higher commission, never did any duty? These commissions were scattered broadcast, and the innumerable persons who held them rendered no military service. In the fall months of 1861 General Frémont had an army of officers, from brigadier generals down to lieutenants, round his headquarters, with commissions like that held by this man.

Mr. PILE. I know that General Frémont issued a large number of commissions which he had no authority to issue. I know that a large number of officers were appointed by him who did no service, and who ought not to have been paid and have not been paid, and I would be the last man to ask this Congress or any Congress of which I was a member to pay them. Those men that hung around headquarters and towns and cities and did no service ought not to be paid. But this is not such a case. He was appointed by General Frémont and has the letter of authority appointing him, dated August, 1861. He was ordered on duty in Kentucky. Some twenty or thirty orders, all of them issued in the field by General C. F. Smith and other officers with whom he served, show that service was rendered by him in the field at the front in the presence of the enemy. He was not in any town, city, or village, loafing or idling away his time, but was rendering service to the country and periling his life to defend it. Some twenty of these original orders were preserved. After the paymaster refused to pay him he collected and preserved the original orders, which are on file before the committee and have been examined by them. They are the orders of officers under whom he served, directed to him at the front in the presence of the enemy.

Mr. HOLMAN. One further question. There was a countermanding, I believe, of some of these orders made by General Frémont by the War Department or some sufficient authority.

For what period after the issuing of the order does the resolution propose to pay this officer?

Mr. PILE. The order that the gentleman refers to simply directed that this class of officers, except such as were retained by competent authority, should be mustered out. The question is about the competent authority, as to how this man was retained. He was at the front in the service. Those who were hanging around St. Louis were discharged, but in the confusion and imperfection of the papers at military headquarters at that early period his name was overlooked, and he was neither discharged nor was an order issued retaining him in service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Were not all the officers dismissed except those regularly appointed?

Mr. PILE. No, sir, they were directed to be mustered out. Many of them had been mustered in, and the order of the War Department directed that they should be mustered out, and orders were accordingly issued mustering them out. But this man was not mustered out and no order was made retaining him. His case was simply ignored. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to make a motion to recommit the resolution, with instructions to bring in a general bill providing for all who were irregularly appointed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, is there a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. That can be decided on the passage of the bill; the point will then arise.

Mr. CHANLER. Would not a count be necessary?

The SPEAKER. It will, if upon the passage of the bill any gentleman desires it. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman desires to shut off debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division on seconding the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over until the next morning hour for private bills.

JOHN McILVAINE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of John McIlvaine.

The SPEAKER. Without leaving copies?

Mr. GARFIELD. Without leaving copies.

Mr. ROSS. I object, unless copies are left.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then let copies be left. Leave to withdraw was accordingly granted, copies being left.

ACTION OF MISSOURI DELEGATION.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] will not further object to my making a personal explanation that I asked leave to make some time ago.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. As the gentleman promises to be a good boy and a clever fellow hereafter, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the gentleman will be allowed five minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yesterday morning, on the presentation of the resolution by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] I was not in my seat, and was not aware of the action on the matter until I saw the Globe this morning. When I entered the Hall this morning the same question was before the House upon the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] The House, by a vote taken by yeas and nays, refused to entertain that resolution as a question of privilege. The impression may go abroad and be received by the country that the refusal to receive that resolution was at the instance of the delegation from Missouri, who had signed the letter which was read at the Clerk's desk. I am not satisfied that that impression should so go abroad, and I wish to state here for myself, and I believe I speak for my colleagues who signed the paper referred to, that we desire the fullest investigation, not only into the facts contained in that letter, but of all the facts in relation to the matter referred to in the letter. We ask that a committee of this House may be appointed for that purpose. And I will say here that there are other facts within my own knowledge and within the knowledge of many others that will enter largely into the question of the privileges of one Senator, the Senator referred to. We desire that it should all be investigated. We will not only interpose no objection to the investigation, but we will render it every aid and assistance that the House and the committee may require, to the end that a full investigation may be had and all the facts in connection with the matter may go to the country. We know very well that we have nothing to fear from that investigation. We know very well that we have neither done nor said anything dishonorable in connection with this matter or anything that will not bear the light before this House and the country. Hence, I say, we interpose no objection to a full investigation of the facts.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know of the gentleman if he thinks that it was right and proper for the whole delegation of the State of Missouri on the other side of the House to call upon one of the Senators who was then considering a case judicially and ask of him in his judgment to withhold his vote upon one of the questions before the court?

Mr. BENJAMIN. In view of the circumstances that preceded the writing of that letter I say it was, and I say it most emphatically; and those circumstances will be brought out by the investigation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then the gentleman, I suppose, bases that remark upon the fact that such was the state of the negotiations between him and the Senator or such a state of facts existed between them as justified it. But on principles of justice and right, without regard to the individuals themselves, was it proper for them to interfere with the decision of the court when this question was pending before it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I apprehend that the committee that will be appointed by this House—if one shall be appointed at all—will give their opinion upon that question, and that the House will either sanction or dissent from the opinion of the committee. I want the House to pass on that very question in the light of all the facts that an investigation may elicit.

Mr. HIGBY. I would ask the gentleman if he did not think that such an intercession as they made was proper if they supposed there was going to be a corrupt decision?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am not prepared to say—

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order. I ask that the words of the gentleman from California in regard to the action of the Senate be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The reporter is not exactly certain as to all the words, as the gentleman from California was not distinctly heard; but the Clerk will report them as taken down.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it not the privilege of the gentleman from New York to repeat the words to which he excepts?

The SPEAKER. He has the right to repeat the words; but it is customary for the words to be taken down from the notes of the reporters for the Globe.

Mr. CHANLER. I will waive any such right if the gentleman from California will restate the words exactly as he uttered them, to the best of his ability.

Mr. HIGBY. I asked the question if he did not think that such intercession as they made through that letter was right if they supposed there was to be a corrupt decision. These were the words.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks those words do not come within the parliamentary law, and for this reason: that the Senate of the United States, forming a part of Congress, is sitting for the trial of the impeachment, and the Chair thinks it is still the Senate, although presided over by the Chief Justice. The rule expressly prohibits any remarks of an offensive character toward the other branch of Congress; and although these words are hypothetical, the Chair thinks they do not come within the parliamentary law, and are out of order, the presumption being in the mind of the gentleman from California that the Senate could make a corrupt decision.

Mr. HIGBY. That was not the intent of the language I used. It was whether the Missouri members acted upon the supposition that there might be a corrupt decision. I did not charge anything of the kind.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] has made no such charge.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that remarks of that character in the Senate, in regard to the action of the House of Representatives, would be ruled out of order by the Presiding Officer there, on the ground of the comity between the two branches of Congress.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the Chair direct that the rule of the House be carried out in this case?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has taken his seat.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Allow me to say further that the members from Missouri alluded to by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE], and whose names are appended to the paper which has been read, had no idea in the world that the Senator therein spoken of would act corruptly, or that any influence at all, beyond what the evidence disclosed, was brought to bear upon him. I state here that we expressly negated the idea that any such influence had been brought to bear. We charge nothing corrupt upon him; nothing in the world.

It will be ascertained in the course of the investigation, if one is had, why that letter was written, who were the parties to it, and the design of it. I knew nothing of it myself until it was presented to me by one of my colleagues and I was requested to sign it. At the same time my colleague stated that the Senator himself requested the signatures of the members of the Missouri delegation in this House and the presentation of the paper to him; that it was signed at his instance, and got up at his request, and for his benefit.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the House to allow me to make a single remark in reference to what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] has said.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not now.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

IMPEACHMENT TRIAL—CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have been directed by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in the matter of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, to report the following preamble and resolution for consideration at this time:

Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That for the further and more efficient prosecution of the impeachment of the President the managers be directed and instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint sub-committees to take testimony, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire of the Chair if we have any power to try Senators?

The SPEAKER. So far as the point of order goes made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] the Chair sustains it.

Mr. ROSS. That is the effect of this resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is not the effect of the resolution at all. I call the previous question on the preamble and resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. These managers were appointed by this House to conduct the prosecution against the President on the part of the House. The managers having discharged their duty, they have nothing more to do. Judgment has in part been rendered by the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it in order for the gentleman to argue that proposition?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not arguing it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. The managers having discharged their duty, they have nothing more to do with the case than counsel have to do with a case after it has been submitted to the court.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order upon two grounds. The first is, that the managers have not yet discharged their duty in the case, for the case has not yet been fully decided. The second ground is, that in presenting the case to the Senate the House expressly reserved to itself the right to take further action.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to another point of order, that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] charges corrupt motives upon the part of the Senate, and this House cannot entertain such a proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that point of order; that is a question for the House to determine.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to appeal from the Chair on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late to take an appeal, another point of order having been made.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the Chair entertain the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER?]

The SPEAKER. He does not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order involving the same question. I make the point that, as this resolution reflects upon the Senate, it is not proper that it should be entertained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

If there be no further points of order the Chair will state that this resolution is open to the same objection made to the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin himself, that there is no direct charge of corruption. It uses almost the same language, "that it appears," "that reports have been made," "that it appearing that corruption has been used," &c.

The rulings in regard to questions of privilege have been uniform so far as the Chair has examined them. Vague charges cannot be considered as questions of privilege, but specific charges alleging corruption upon the responsibility of any member can be. The Chair therefore stated to-day to the gentleman from Wisconsin that while his resolution was not a question of privilege, as it recited that whereas it appeared there was a corrupt purpose on the part of certain gentlemen of the delegation from Missouri to influence the Senator from Missouri, still if the resolution had made the direct charge of corruption on his responsibility as a member, for which he would be responsible to the House if it proved not true, the Chair would entertain that as a question of privilege.

The Chair decides that the managers, under the order of the House, have the right to report resolutions, not as a question of privilege, but as a matter of right. This resolution is open to the same objection as to its consideration which has been repeatedly made of late under the rule to be found on page 71 of the Digest. If there be objection to its present consideration the question then will be put to the House whether it shall be considered or not.

Mr. CHANLER. The ruling of the Chair

as to corruption being used in forming a decision in the court of impeachment does not come within the ruling which affects and attacks one of the coordinate branches of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will repeat the ruling that he made before. The gentleman cannot change the language of the Chair by quoting it as he does.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not wish to—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. If the gentleman will look at the Globe he will find that the decision of the Chair is in the same language that the Chair has just stated it. He decided that vague charges of corruption cannot be entertained as questions of privilege, and the Chair now reaffirms that decision; but he has also decided that the managers have the right to present for the consideration of the House whatever proposition they may see fit, and the House of Representatives has also the right to say whether they will or will not consider it. The gentleman has the right to say the House shall not consider it if he thinks it ought not to be considered.

Mr. CHANLER. I make that motion, and demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to make his statement.

Mr. MUNGEN. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. MUNGEN. I do not want any Star Chamber tribunal organized here.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Is the question whether the House will consider this resolution at all, or consider it as a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now consider it?

Mr. BROOKS. How long a time have these managers the right to make these reports?

The SPEAKER. Until the impeachment is ended.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it not now ended?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole was that two thirds of the Senate not having voted for the eleventh article, the Chief Justice declared the President was acquitted on that article, and that thereupon the Senate, sitting for the trial of the President, adjourned until the 26th of May. The trial is not ended.

Mr. PHELPS. I listened very carefully to the resolution when it was read, and it distinctly charges that corrupt considerations have entered into the verdict of the Senate.

Mr. KELSEY. I object to debate.

Mr. PHELPS. Is not that out of order?

Mr. BINGHAM. It contains no such insinuation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Maryland is presenting an argument. If he is of the opinion he has indicated he has his remedy by his vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask a parliamentary question.

Several MEMBERS. Question!

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, and objection is made.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 26, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Reader W. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Knott, McCormick, Mungen, Nicholson, Phelps, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Van Auker, and Woodward—26.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Axtehl, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Benton, Boutwell, Brownell, Buckland, Barr, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Jenckes, Judd, Kelley, Ketcham, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Niblack, Nunn, Paine, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—84.

So the House resolved to consider the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is now before the House, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to delay the House but a moment or two in regard to this resolution. I desire to say, however, inasmuch as questions of order have been raised here, and intimations made that this is an attempt to exercise power, on the part of the House, not warranted by the Constitution, that I speak for myself, and, I believe, for every one of the managers appointed by the House, when I say that resolution is a resolution, as its words expressly declare, for the more efficient prosecution of the impeachment against the President of the United States heretofore presented by the House made upon information communicated to the managers that corrupt influences have been employed to prevent the successful prosecution of the impeachment by the House.

Mr. MUNGEN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MUNGEN. My point is this, that the managers having been appointed to conduct the articles of impeachment against the President, I hold it is improper now to introduce a resolution for investigation into the alleged corruption of a Senator or Senators, that being a matter for the Senate itself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, upon the ground that the House of Representatives have resolved to consider this resolution reported from the managers, and the resolution is before the House by the order of the House itself.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. For a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to ask the gentleman if the committee have the consent of the high court of impeachment to reopen the case and offer new evidence; and if they have not the consent of that court, whether they intend to open it up and offer evidence anew at all events?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman ought to understand, if he had attended to the prosecution of this case in the Senate, that when the question was asked of the managers by the counsel for the President after the formal close of the testimony during the trial, that on behalf of the managers and of the House, I notified the counsel and the Senate that the House of Representatives, according to the uniform practice in such cases, did not surrender its right at any time before judgment to present additional testimony. And they have already been notified on the record of the reservation of that right, placed there in writing, to be presented at any time before judgment.

And having stated this, I desire to state in regard to the other matter which has been raised here, that the Constitution having vested in this House the "sole power of impeachment" has clothed this body with power unto the day of judgment to investigate all corruptions by any man or any men, with a view to prevent the decision of this case according to the law and the evidence.

Mr. JOHNSON. That answers my question. It has not been answered before.

A MEMBER. To impeach Senators?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not talking of impeaching Senators. But, sir, at an early day in the history of the country nobody challenged the right to do it. The House proceeded to the bar of the Senate and demanded the sequestration of the seat of a Senator and it was done. This House is clothed with full power to do this thing and no man can challenge it here, or anywhere else, successfully.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir. I desire to state that we are acting within the scope of the authority conferred upon us. We have no doubt that the House, when they undertook this impeachment, intended, as they solemnly declared by their resolution, that all the power with which the Constitution clothed them for the just and legal prosecution of this impeachment should be employed from time to time, as the occasion might require. That is all that this resolution contemplates—to prevent the obstruction of justice—to see whether the rightful power of this House to prosecute impeachment is attempted, wrongfully and corruptly, to be interfered with, and controlled by anybody, either by the President or by the President's hired agents! It is a power, I say again, that no man can successfully challenge in any tribunal of this country; a power that even habeas corpus cannot control; a question that has been ruled solemnly upon in the Supreme Court forty years ago, and never questioned by any man since. I do not say that it will turn out that the information that has been brought to the managers will be sustained by the facts, but I do say that we have a right, on the showing here, to an investigation.

Mr. BROOKS. What course do the managers intend to pursue?

Mr. BINGHAM. Simply to pursue the line indicated by this resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. Open doors or shut doors?

Mr. BINGHAM. Open doors or shut doors! We intend to obey the order of the House?

Mr. BROOKS. Is it to be an ex parte proceeding—what is sometimes called an inquisition—or a public examination?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman need not inquire of me any further. He seems to be in search of knowledge under difficulties. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. Very great. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Very great difficulties. Nearly ever since he was born this thing he calls an inquisition was practiced by that party of which he professes to-day to be the chief leader without challenge. Out of his own mouth I condemn him. [Laughter.] Never did your Democratic organization, when it controlled this House, proceed with an investigation touching the privileges of the House or the rights of the people in any other mode than we propose to proceed with it to-day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. I insist that the gentleman from Ohio shall not address this side of the House, but the Chair. He is looking over heres so savagely that he has nearly driven us all out of our seats. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio must address the Chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, I should be glad, if I have that privilege without violating the rules of the House, to look at the gentleman's smiles. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to see the gentleman smile once. I have not seen him smile since he commenced this impeachment matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman's point of order is as weak as his case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws the point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, I do not. I do not want the gentleman to look at us in that way any more.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is what is called "point no point." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have said very nearly or quite all that it is needful for me to say. I will merely add that the managers on the part of the House, by the leave of the House, propose to prosecute this impeachment in good faith, in accordance with the power conferred upon the House by the Constitution, unto the day of judgment.

Mr. JOHNSON. And upon all the articles?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not answer any more questions. I call the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman, before he takes his seat—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has already taken his seat.

Mr. CHANLER. I appeal to his courtesy—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York cannot violate the rules of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not wish to violate any rule whatever.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio refused to yield further.

Mr. CHANLER. I merely wish to ask the Chair a question.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order except by the consent of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. Certainly the House cannot object to a question relative to the matter before it; that is not personal to any one.

Mr. KELSEY. I object to anything out of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to lay the resolution upon the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARD. I rise to a question of order. I want to know if, under the rules, this is not a dilatory motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer that question by having read the last part of the rule adopted by the House on the 25th of February last.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And that during the pendency of resolutions in the House relative to said impeachment thereafter no dilatory motions shall be received except one motion on each day that the House do now adjourn."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House do now adjourn, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 79, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Boyer, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, McCormick, Mungen, Nicholson, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Van Auker, and Woodward—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Butler, Calkins, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullum, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pile, Plants, Polesie, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Arnell, Axtehl, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Boutwell, Brownell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Hawkins, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Jenckes, Judd, Kelley, Kerr, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Niblack, Nunn, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Randall, Robertson, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—88.

So the House refused to adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence after to-day was granted to Mr. FERRY, Mr. HALSEY, Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia, Mr. MALLORY, Mr. WASHBURN of Indiana, Mr. SHANKS, and Mr. BROOMALL.

IMPEACHMENT—CORRUPT PRACTICES.

THE SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion to lay the preamble and resolution upon the table, upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] has called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 86, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chanler, Getz, Golladay, Holman, Johnson, McCormick, Phelps, Pruyn, Robinson, and Woodward—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eta, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—86.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kerr, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Paine, Poland, Pomeroy, Randall, Ross, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Tabor, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—87.

So the preamble and resolution were not laid on the table.

The question recurred upon seconding the previous question.

MR. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] allow me to make a suggestion to him. Let this question go to a select committee, or at all events to a committee which will have upon it some representative of the minority of this House. It is a mockery to send this to a committee which has no member upon it of the Democratic party, which we claim to represent a majority of the people of the United States.

MR. BINGHAM. I insist upon my demand for the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—yeas 75, no 1; no quorum voting.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the rule be read requiring members to vote.

THE SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule, after which the Chair will appoint tellers.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote unless the House shall excuse him."

THE SPEAKER. The Chair will state, as he has often stated, that he cannot compel members to vote, as they are required to do by their own rules. If members refuse to vote, they are in contempt of the House of Representatives and of their own rules. No quorum having voted on the last vote, the Chair will appoint tellers, and requests every member to vote.

MR. BROOKS and MR. BROOMALL were appointed to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—yeas 82, noes 14.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, which was upon the adoption of the preamble and resolution.

MR. HOLMAN. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 14, not voting 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eta, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Knott, Mungen, Nicholson, Phelps, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, and Stewart—14.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Golladay, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kerr, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Miller, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Niblack, Nunn, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stone, Tabor, Taylor, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—87.

So the preamble and resolution were adopted.

MR. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MR. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order, that the vote has not been taken on the preamble.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair stated the question to be on the preamble and resolution, and they were read together. No gentleman called for a division of the question, and it is now too late to raise the point.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had disagreed to the concurrent resolution of the House providing for an adjournment from the 16th to the 25th instant.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

MR. TWICHELL asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in his family.

MR. HOTCHKISS, MR. TAFTE, and MR. CAKE asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence.

And then, on motion of MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois, the House (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By MR. JULIAN: The petition of 15 citizens of Wayne county, Indiana, praying a reduction in the expenditures of the different departments of the Government.

By MR. POLAND: The petition of S. H. Edwards and others, citizens of Guilford, Vermont, praying Congress to establish a line of steamships between the United States and the Republic of Liberia.

By MR. TAFTE: The petition of B. F. Perkins and others, citizens of Nebraska, asking an amendment of the homestead law so as to secure certain portions of the public land occupied as homesteads as sites for school-houses.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 18, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's legislative proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 237) to revive and extend certain acts of Congress relative to land claims in the State of Missouri;

A bill (H. R. No. 1075) to authorize adjudication of claim No. 45 in the report of the surveyor general of the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. No. 1080) for the relief of Edward B. Allen;

A bill (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Robert L. Lindsay;

A bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 266) to authorize the enlargement of the Hygeia Hotel at Fortress Monroe.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of contracts made by the quartermaster's department during the month of March, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating a letter of Major General Canby, and its inclosures, relating to an ordinance of the South Carolina convention providing for the assembling of the General Assembly, the temporary organization of each house, the installation of Governor and the Lieutenant Governor, and the continuation of the president of the convention in office until after installation for the purpose of administering oaths; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating a corrected copy of the constitution framed by the Virginia convention, as furnished by Brevet Major General J. M. Schofield, commanding the first military district.

MR. WILSON. I move the reference of that document to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MR. DRAKE. I suppose it ought to be printed, and I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed, if there be no objection.

MR. WILSON. Not the documents with it, but the constitution.

MR. DRAKE. The constitution is the only document.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in obedience to law, a report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, stating the operations and progress in the survey of the coast during the year ending November 1, 1867.

MR. ANTHONY. I offer the usual resolution for the distribution of that document:

Resolved, That there be printed two thousand extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for 1867, of which one thousand copies shall be for the use of the Senate, and one thousand copies shall be for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

That resolution under the rule goes to the Committee on Printing. It has, however, been considered by the committee, and I am instructed to ask for its present consideration and passage. It provides for the printing of the usual number that has always been voted.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 170, to provide for deficiency of expenses incurred in the survey of Indian reservations, and that it be taken up for consideration. I have conversed with the chairman of that committee. He is not now in his seat; but the committee have considered it informally, and there is no objection in that committee—as I learn from him and other members of the committee—to the passage of the bill; and some of my constituents are very much interested in it, and I should be very glad if the Senate would consent to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to take it up at this time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to present some memorials.

Mr. HARLAN. I will not object to memorials coming in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object. Let us go on with the regular order of business. We shall get along faster by adhering to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One objection carries it over at this time.

Mr. HARLAN. Would not my motion to discharge the committee be in order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be after the morning business is through. By a new rule the morning business must be taken in its order.

LAWS OF COLORADO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the laws passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Colorado; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am requested by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] who is absent from illness, to move that he have indefinite leave of absence, as the period of his ability to return to the service of the Senate is uncertain. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that Mr. GRIMES, the Senator from Iowa, have indefinite leave of absence.

Mr. CONNESS. Is that in order until petitions are disposed of?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a question of privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a privileged question, I suppose.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented a memorial of underwriters and merchants of Boston, Massachusetts, requesting that no means be adopted by Congress to lessen the full efficiency of the Coast Survey; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented four memorials of officers of the Army, protesting against the passage of the bill which deprives all retired officers of the Army of their longevity or service rations; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CATTELL presented a memorial of Robert Shoemaker, president of the Philadelphia Drug Exchange, praying the reduction of the tax on distilled spirits to fifty cents per gallon; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented five memorials of underwriters and merchants of Portland, Maine, protesting against the adoption of any means that will lessen the efficiency of the Coast Survey; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Wisconsin River Valley railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART presented the petition of Valentine H. Voorhees, praying compensation for services rendered as second lieutenant from March 1 to November 30, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLEY presented the memorial of Joseph Nock, praying the passage of a law requiring all patentees and assignees of patents to cause to be stamped or engraved on every patented article offered for sale the date of the patent; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CONNESS presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for an extension of mail route No. 14725 from Havilah to Independence, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. COLE presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a tri-weekly mail route from Cheyval Peak, Nevada, to Summit, in California; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, praying that the lands of the Mendocino Indian reservation may be subject to settlement and preemption; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MCCREERY presented the petition of Robert Gibson, praying compensation for subsistence stores supplied to the Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of George Sibbald, asking an appropriation to aid him in testing an invention in the nature of a caloric engine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Catharina Eckhardt, praying that her eldest daughter be admitted to the benefit of the pension act of July 25, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Washington, praying for the appointment of a board of colored commissioners of education; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 483) relative to the repayment of fees paid on canceled homestead entries; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read by their titles and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 237) to revive and extend certain acts of Congress relative to land claims in the State of Missouri—to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 1075) to authorize adjudication of claim No. 45 in the report of the surveyor general of the Territory of New Mexico—to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 1080) for the relief of Edward B. Allen—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Robert L. Lindsay—to the Committee on Claims.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 266) to authorize the enlargement of the Hygeia Hotel at Fortress Monroe—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

The bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that bill will go to the Committee on Private Land Claims. The bill relates to a certain Mexican grant in the State of California. It is a private question in all respects. Besides, the Committee on Private Land Claims is composed in part of some of the most distinguished lawyers in this body. If some of them were not present, I would mention their names. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that that motion will not prevail, because this case involves the review of a decision of the Supreme Court. The bill came from the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives, and it seems to me very proper that it should be examined by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. No doubt there are some very good lawyers upon the Committee on Private Land Claims; but the questions to be determined in this matter are of a legal character, and were examined in the House by the Committee on the Judiciary. I think that the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate is the proper committee to take jurisdiction of it.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I regret that my friend from Nevada insists on sending this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a question upon the merits of which I will say that I have not come to any opinion whatever, and I only desire that it shall have the fullest and most thorough investigation; and according as the committee to which it shall be sent shall report so shall be my vote upon it. My friend, I understand, is very directly and positively against the bill, and he proposes to send it to a committee of which he is a member. I hardly think that that is just the thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from California be kind enough to state again what the bill is?

Mr. CONNESS. It is a bill for the relief of Mr. McGarrahan, involving the title to a Mexican grant in the State of California. The case has gone through the courts, and a decision has been made against the title represented by the party in whose favor this bill is. I was under the impression when that decision was made that it was a righteous one; I do not know to the contrary now; but Mr. McGarrahan comes to Congress claiming that he has been very badly treated in the case, and that the facts, when fully investigated, show that his title was a good one; and he asks to be allowed to perfect his title by paying the Government of the United States $1 25 an acre for the amount of land within the grant; and upon its reference to the Judiciary Committee of the House and full investigation that body passed the bill. Knowing that the Judiciary Committee of this body has a great deal of work to do, and knowing also that there is a Committee on Private Land Claims in this body, which has for its members such Senators as the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] and the Senator from Michigan, now absent, [Mr. HOWARD,] and believing that they will give it a close, thorough, and full investigation, I prefer its reference there, not because my friend from Nevada belongs to the Judiciary Committee and may vote against the bill. I say that in justice to him, for I have no feeling on that subject; but I wish the reference to the Committee on Private Land Claims, because I believe it will get there such an investigation within a reasonable time as it ought to have. Besides, I think my friend ought to allow the Senators from the State of California to have something to say about their own business.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not propose to interfere with any jurisdiction of my friend from California, and I do not wish to be placed in a position of desiring to bring before the Judiciary Committee, or any committee of which I am a member, a measure to which I am thoroughly opposed. The Senator has truly stated that I am opposed to this bill, thoroughly opposed to it, believing that the Supreme Court was entirely right; but my reason for making the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary is this: it is a bill for the relief of William McGarrahan, not indicating at all by its title the nature of the bill; it was before the Judiciary Committee of the House, and I supposed, as a matter of course, it would go to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. The report of the Judiciary Committee of the House is a review of the action of the Supreme Court, and, as I understand, Mr. McGarrahan complains principally of the action of that tribunal and comes to Congress for relief, saying that great injustice has been done to him in that court. For that reason the House of Representatives referred the matter to the Judiciary Committee of that body, and it seemed to me that it should have the same reference in the Senate, and I had no other desire but to have it reviewed here by the proper committee. What the party complains of is a want of fair dealing in the Supreme Court.

Now, I do not wish to interfere with California matters, but I think this a public question, one with regard to the public lands.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will, perhaps, allow me to make a correction of one of his statements. What this Mr. McGarrahan complains of is not the decision of the Supreme Court, but it is that his case went to the Supreme Court on technical questions not involving the merits, and that he was deprived of his rights in the court below. That is the real statement which he makes.

Mr. STEWART. All that matter as to how it got to the Supreme Court is reviewed by the Supreme Court. Mr. McGarrahan—and that is the very matter that is to go before the Judiciary Committee—attempted to rely upon a technicality as against the merits, and the Supreme Court say his case had no merits. This bill is a review of the action of the Supreme Court with regard to this matter, and allows Mr. McGarrahan to buy out a mining district at $1 25 per acre. There are large mining interests involved in this matter. The land which he claims is not a piece of agricultural land, but he desires to buy at $1 25 an acre a mining district. It is not like other relief that has been had. If that is to be allowed to be done, the consequences will be very important. It seems to me that as it involves a complete review of the action of the Supreme Court, and if that court were right he had no claim, and he ought not to have any relief, it would certainly be proper to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary for examination.

Mr. HOWE. Who were the parties to the litigation in the Supreme Court?

Mr. STEWART. Mr. McGarrahan and the Government of the United States. He claimed under a Mexican grant.

Mr. HOWE. And if the petitioner does not own the land the United States does?

Mr. CONNESS. No; that is not the case.

Mr. STEWART. If the petitioner does not own the land the United States has got the fee; but it is settled upon by miners who claim under the laws of Congress legalizing their possession. Portions of the land are claimed in that way, preempted, as it were, under the mining rules, and other portions are public land. The controversy in the Supreme Court was between Mr. McGarrahan and the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I know nothing about this case; never heard of it until it was mentioned in the Senate, and therefore I do not care to what committee it goes, except that I happen to be upon the Committee on the Judiciary, and I would say to the Senator from Nevada that the fact that this bill went to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House does not seem to be a reason why it should go to that committee here. Our committees are organized somewhat differently from the House committees, and we have a committee on purpose to look up private land claims. It is called the Committee on Private Land Claims. I understand from the Senator from California that this is precisely that case—a private land claim about which there is some controversy, which I do not propose to go into and do not understand enough of to go into. If this bill does not go to the Committee on Private Land Claims, I should like to know what bill should go there? It seems to me that that committee is organized for the consideration of just such a bill.

Mr. CONNESS. And it has good lawyers upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Lawyers are always put upon it, and those who are supposed to be somewhat familiar with the private land grants in different parts of the country. It has always been a very able committee ever since I have been a member of the body; and it really seems to me that that is the appropriate committee to which to refer this bill. I think all bills should go to their appropriate committees. That is the only suggestion I have to make about it. It strikes me, as this is clearly a private land claim, that that is the appropriate committee to which it should be referred.

Mr. STEWART. Very well. If the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary thinks it does not legitimately belong to that committee, I will let it go to the Committee on Private Land Claims; but inasmuch as it has been stated that I was opposed to the bill, I wish to say that I believe there is no foundation whatever for it. I want to reiterate that; I do not think there is any foundation for it; and the Senator from California was right in stating my position with regard to it.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no doubt in the world that whatever opinions my friend from Nevada entertains on the subject are honestly and fairly entertained; and I will now say, to conclude, that the parties in interest against Mr. McGarrahan in this case are mostly my personal friends, and that my only desire in the case is that it shall have a full and thorough investigation, because I will not stand here to do more than justice even to my friends.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; that is withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on referring the bill to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

WHITEHALL AND PLATTSBURG RAILROAD.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1062) to grant the right of way to the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company, to report it back without amendment, and I ask that it be put upon its passage. It has the approval of the War Department.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company to locate, construct, and operate its railroad across the land belonging to the United States at Plattsburg, in the State of New York, upon a line commencing in the highway leading from Plattsburg to Peru, at a point one hundred feet north from the north line of the inclosure surrounding the Government buildings, running thence in a northeasterly direction about sixteen hundred feet to the bank of Lake Champlain, thence northwardly along the bank of the lake to the north line of the land belonging to the United States, such line of road being designated on a map of survey made by James P. Campbell, and now on file in the office of Secretary of War; but the right of way herein granted is to be subject to such restrictions as the Secretary of War may think necessary to protect the interests of the United States; and no more than four rods in width of the Government land is to be occupied under these provisions.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROADS IN WISCONSIN AND MICHIGAN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.

R. No. 91) concerning certain lands granted to railroad companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment of the House was to add to the amendment of the Senate the following proviso:

And provided further, That if the said Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, in the State of Michigan, shall not have completed according to law ten additional miles of their railroad on or before the 1st day of January, 1880, and shall not in like manner complete ten miles of said railroad in each and every year thereafter, then it shall be lawful for the Legislature of the said State of Michigan to declare the grant of lands to said company to be forfeited and to confer the said grant of lands upon some other company in the same manner as if the said grant was now for the first time made to said State of Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to call the attention of the Senate to a peculiarity in that amendment, so that they will vote upon it understandingly. In 1856 Congress made sundry grants of land for the benefit of specific railroads in the States of Wisconsin and Michigan. Some of those grants were taken up and the roads have gone on. This particular grant for a road from Marquette to Ontonagon, in the northern part of Michigan, has not been taken up and the road built in compliance with the act of Congress. That act of Congress provided that in case of non-compliance with the terms of the grant the lands should revert to the United States, to be granted again, of course, with its other public lands to such purposes as Congress in its wisdom should think advisable. We passed a House joint resolution with a Senate amendment a month or two ago, which provided for reviving these grants in favor of the very same railroads to which they were given before; that is, extending the time for completing the roads. Now, the House of Representatives send that resolution back to us with a provision that if this particular railroad, the Marquette and Ontonagon line, fails to build its road within a certain new specified time, the lands, instead of reverting to us, the whole people, shall belong to the State of Michigan, to be dispensed out to whatever railroads it may think advisable, the same as if we had now granted these lands for the first time to the State of Michigan.

I object to that altogether. If we make conditional grants for the construction of specific lines of railroad the lands ought, in the first place, to be devoted to the construction of those specific lines for the local and public benefit both of the parties who reside along the line and for the general benefit of the people, and we ought not to confide, in such a case of failure, these lands to any State, to be given to other corporations, which may, for aught we know, be located in other parts of the State, and whose interest may not subserve the general interest that we all have in view; but we ought to hold, as we always hitherto have held, the right, if these grants are not complied with, the conditions upon which they are given are not fulfilled, to have the control and disposition of the lands remain in ourselves; and therefore it is that I object, for one, to agreeing to this amendment of the House of Representatives as it stands. I do not object to the particular extensions of time that are provided for this railroad, because that is a mere matter of detail; but the principle of giving up these lands to the control of the State of Michigan, if this particular railroad company fails to comply with those terms, is a principle that I decidedly object to.

Mr. HOWE. I wish I could touch the generosity of my friend from Vermont—

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can touch it through his justice.

Mr. HOWE. But if I fail on that I hope to get the justice of the Senate. This grant was made to the State of Michigan to build a certain road within the time mentioned by the Senator from Vermont. The State of Michigan made a certain railway company its trustee to administer the grant and build the road. The company has made some progress, but has not completed the road. Some time since a joint resolution came to the Senate from the House of Representatives proposing to extend the time to Michigan to complete this road, and at the same time, and in the same resolution, to extend the time to Wisconsin to complete one of her roads on which progress has been made. The honorable Senator from Vermont took exception to that resolution, urging that while it said it only provided for these two roads, the Northwestern and the Ontonagon roads, yet he thought by its language it might be extended to other roads, and therefore he drew an amendment, to which I assented, to confine the extension of time simply to these two roads. That was his purpose, and that was mine. He thought the resolution as it came here might operate on other roads. I thought it did not, but he drew an amendment to satisfy himself; the Senate agreed to it, and it went back to the House. In the meantime some of the Representatives from Michigan had become a little distrustful that the company which now stands as the trustee of Michigan was not likely to make that progress with the road that they wished to have made, and they have proposed this amendment to oblige that company to go on and build ten miles this season and then ten miles year after year upon the forfeiture of their interest in the grant; and if they forfeit the grant under that, it would belong to Michigan, not to be appropriated to any other road, but that Michigan may provide some other company, or go on and build the road itself. We agreed to extend the time to Michigan. Michigan now wants the privilege of selecting another trustee if this trustee does not behave; and, as I understand, the Senator from Vermont says that the time shall not be extended to Michigan unless Michigan will continue this same trustee. Is that right?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I must appeal, not to the generosity of my friend from Wisconsin, but to his memory. I have not maintained any such proposition. I do not insist upon the State of Michigan continuing this trustee, as my friend is pleased to call it; I insist upon adhering to the same line of legislation that we have always adhered to: that if the conditions upon which we grant these lands are not complied with they shall revert to the United States instead of being left at the disposal of the Legislature of the State of Michigan. That is what I insist upon.

Mr. HOWE. Upon that principle, if we ever have adhered to it, these lands would be gone; but it is because we do not wish to adhere to that that we agreed to this amendment extending the time to Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend is mistaken about that. We did not agree to it upon any such reason at all, so far as I am concerned. We were willing not to take advantage of the lapse of time under the peculiar circumstances that have existed for the last few years arising from the failure of this company to comply with the legislation of 1856 and again of 1864. We did agree to extend the time by the amendment that we adopted, confining it to this specific line, as to which the application it was said really was made; and then we left the law by our express provision in the bill as we passed it, that if they failed to conform to the new time granted the lands should again revert to us, just as the act of 1856, which originally granted these lands, provided. I will read the provision; it is not new or unusual; it is in all the grants; this is the first time, to my knowledge, when there has been any attempt to change it. The fourth section of the act of June 3, 1856, provided: "And if any of said roads is not completed within ten years no further sales shall be made and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States." Now, the proposition is—and it is impossible to disguise it if we only listen to the language as it comes from the other House—that instead of, on non-compliance upon the part of this company, the lands reverting to the United States or being subject to the control of the United States, they shall be subject to the control of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, to dispose of to such railroads as it shall deem fit. I ask, Mr. President, that the Secretary again read the House amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That if the said Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, in the State of Michigan, shall not have completed, according to law, ten additional miles of their railroad on or before the 1st day of January, 1869, and shall not in like manner complete ten miles of said railroad in each and every year thereafter, then it shall be lawful for the Legislature of the said State of Michigan to declare the grant of lands to said company to be forfeited and to confer the said grant of lands upon some other company in the same manner as if the said grant was now for the first time made to said State of Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There you have it, Mr. President. It shall be lawful for the Legislature of the State of Michigan to forfeit this grant at the end of the year if ten miles be not built, and so on, and then to confer it on such other company as it may please, not necessarily for the purpose of building that identical line. That is to be guessed at. It may give it in aid of any railroad that it likes, so far as the language of the law goes. And then you will notice the additional peculiar provision, "having the same powers and rights as if this grant to the State of Michigan were now for the first time made." That sweeps out from under it all the prior legislation that imposes conditions and limitations and regulations as to the manner of sale and disposition of these lands. So that all you have, if you take this statute (if it shall become a law) as it stands, will be the provisions of this bill alone, which simply grants them to the State of Michigan, by inference derived from the very last line of it, these lands for the use of this particular railroad, with a right to declare a forfeiture at the end of the year, and then to dispose of the lands to such railroad as it pleases. I submit to my friend from Wisconsin that that is quite a different proposition from any to which we have hitherto been invited.

Mr. HOWE. I submit to my friend that the statute-book is not stuffed full, but stuffed largely of bills just like it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us see one. I should like to see one with a provision such as that which has been inserted here by the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I voted against the bill to which this is an amendment. I had no particular objection to that bill, but I am opposed to the whole system. Now, however, it comes to us in a tenfold worse form. These lands were granted originally to Michigan to construct a railroad line pointed out in the bill, of which Congress was informed at the time. It is now intended by this amendment to put these lands in the hands of the State of Michigan to be applied to the construction of a railroad of which this Congress has never heard and which has never been pointed out. Under the concluding language of this amendment, these lands can be applied to the construction of a railroad between two other points that have not been named, and perhaps running in an entirely different direction.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, we ought not to make any mistake about a point as plain as this. It does seem to me that there is no need of making such a mistake as the Senator from Indiana has just made, or as I have made. He says that if we agree to this amendment, this grant can be applied to building any road between any other two points. If that is so, I do not know what force there is in language. The grant went to Michigan to build a specific line of road marked out in the grant, and Michigan made this company her trustee to execute that trust and build that road. Michigan, feeling now that that company are not going along fast enough, wants to hurry them up. When you agreed to the original amendment drawn by the Senator from Vermont, you agreed to extend the time of Michigan, but it is no object to have that time extended unless the company will execute the trust, and Michigan wants the privilege, if this company does not go on with the trust, to vest it in somebody else, as if the grant was now made to Michigan for the first time. What is that? To build another road? Surely not.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to call the attention of my friend from Wisconsin to the phraseology, and it can easily be seen where the trouble of this amendment is. The amendment provides that the State of Michigan may "declare the grant of lands to said company to be forfeited," and may "confer the said grant of lands upon some other company in the same manner as if the said grant was now for the first time made to said State of Michigan." Does it say "to some other company to construct the road between the same points?" Not a bit of it.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, but I ask the Senator from Indiana if there was a company on the footstool to which this grant could have been assigned in 1856 that would not have been compelled to apply the grant to this very road, because that is the road marked out in the act making the grant?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this amendment provides in plain terms that the State of Michigan can assign the grant to some other company. It does not say "to build a road between the same points," but to assign it to some other company as if the grant was made to that company in the first place, as if it had been originally granted to build a road between two other points.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Indiana answer me this question: when the grant was made to Michigan it was made in trust to build that line of road, and if Michigan had assigned it to the New York Central Railway Company would not the New York Central Railway Company have been compelled to build that road with it? That is the question.

Mr. MORTON. Why, Mr. President, if it was intended to apply these lands to the construction of a road between the same points mentioned in the original bill it would have been the easiest thing in the world to have said so; but I maintain, as a construction of law, that under this phraseology the State of Michigan could apply them to the construction of a railroad running in a different direction and between different towns. There certainly can be no doubt of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not agree to the amendment with an amendment inserting words to make that clear?

Mr. MORTON. The question now is on concurring in the amendment of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not concur in the amendment with an amendment inserting words to make the meaning clear?

Mr. MORTON. I am not in favor of the bill at all. I voted against it originally.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator from Indiana allow me to make a single suggestion?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If I understand this proviso of the House, the substance of it is that if the company to whom the State has granted the lands for the purpose of building the road shall fail, then the State of Michigan shall have the power to "transfer the said grant" to another company. Now, what is meant by "transferring the said grant?" What is the grant? The grant is that which is contained in the original bill, which provides that Congress grants to the State of Michigan the alternate sections of land upon a given line, and allows the State of Michigan to give those lands to a company which will undertake to build the road. This bill extends the time to the State of Michigan to complete the road; but the House of Representatives, for greater security, have inserted a proviso to enable the State of Michigan to complete the building of the road, that if this company shall fail to build its first ten miles within a certain time the State of Michigan can "transfer the said grant." What is the meaning of "the said grant?" It is the grant contained in the original act—a grant of lands to build a road on that line. It does not extend the time beyond the time specified in the bill itself. It seems to me there is no ambiguity about this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of Saturday is before the Senate, which is House bill No. 1045.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the special order be postponed, with a view of taking up the bill mentioned by me this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. The unfinished business will not take five minutes. It is a bill making an appropriation for one of the military districts of the South; and I have official information from General Meade stating that it is of the utmost consequence that the money should be immediately appropriated. One of his aids is here waiting now for the money. It is absolutely indispensable to carry on his operations in the third military district.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, is the unfinished business.

Mr. HARLAN. With the Senator's statement I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to have permission, before the unfinished business is taken up, to offer a resolution, to be laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received if there be no objection.

BRIDGES ON OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RIVERS.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 384, to authorize the building of a railroad bridge across the Ohio river at Paducah, Kentucky, be recommended to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and that the said committee be requested to consider, and if in their judgment thought best to report, a general bill authorizing bridges to be constructed over the Ohio and Mississippi rivers upon such terms and conditions as will not materially interfere with navigation.

*As I want to make a statement on that resolution before the vote is taken upon it, I ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table, no objection being made.

RECONSTRUCTION EXPENSES.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the unfinished business be laid aside informally. I think we shall soon come to a vote on the bill we have been discussing.

Mr. SHERMAN. The unfinished business will not take three minutes, and the Senator's bill will then come up again. This is a matter of public business and public necessity.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well, then, I shall not object; but I shall move to take this up afterward.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868. It proposes to appropriate, for the expense of carrying into effect the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, for the third military district, the sum of $87,701 50.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROADS IN WISCONSIN AND MICHIGAN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate resume the consideration of the joint resolution which was just laid aside.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the vote is taken upon that motion I desire to say to the Senate that I consider it my duty to press the bill for the recognition of the State government in Arkansas. The matter was discussed somewhat on Saturday, and I hope the Senate will consent to take it up. It is regarded by all as an important matter. The representatives are here waiting, and although I have no objection to this particular business coming up if it is not to lead to debate, if it does I shall make a motion to lay it aside with a view of taking up the bill I have named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the Senate amendment to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) concerning certain lands granted to railroad companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives by striking out the last words that have been referred to, all after the word "then" in the sixth line from the bottom, and inserting the words "the said lands shall be forfeited to the United States as provided in section one of this act," so that if this amendment be adopted the bill will be left to stand exactly as it passed the House of Representatives originally on that point, giving the extended time that the House of Representatives desired.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator's motion is evidently not in order. This is a House bill amended by the Senate, to which Senate amendment the House of Representatives has proposed an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to suggest to my friend from Iowa that the rule about amendments on amendments does not apply to propositions pending between the two Houses at all. We can amend any proposition the House of Representatives send here if it is in the fortieth stage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order to amend the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With this amendment the proposition will read:

And provided further, That if the said Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, in the State of Michigan, shall not have completed, according to law, ten additional miles of their railroad on or before the 1st day of January, 1869, and shall not in like manner complete ten miles of said railroad in each year thereafter, then the said lands shall be forfeited to the United States as provided in section one of this act.

Section one, it will be borne in mind, is the House section, and that section, which was agreed to here, provided originally as follows:

That the said companies or either of them shall fully complete their said railroads in the manner required by law on or before the 1st day of December, 1872, at which time a failure shall forfeit the lands to the United States.

That part was so agreed to here, so that it now stands, so far as the two Houses are concerned, as the law. All that the Senate did was to add a proviso to limit the general language of the descriptive part of the section to two railway lines specially named. Now, the House of Representatives, to add a further proviso giving a specific time a little different to one of these railways, with a provision at the end that if they fail to comply the State of Michigan shall take the lands to be disposed of in the way named by this bill instead of reverting to the United States as the original section already agreed to provides. All that my amendment now does is to strike out these last words and to leave it exactly as the House left it in the first place, that in the case of failure the United States shall have control of the lands; and that is in accordance with all the legislation we have passed heretofore. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. The effect of this amendment, as will be seen at a glance, would be, in case this company fail to take the lands from the State, to make them revert back to the Government. All the State of Michigan asks in this particular is that in case the company she has now selected as her agent to build this road shall fail she may be permitted to select another agent who she believes will complete the road. It is a mistake to suppose this is really a donation from the Government. There are six or seven hundred miles of vacant lands entirely worthless to-day to the Government in the northern portion of the State of Michigan, certain alternate sections of which are given to the State of Michigan to finish this road. These lands are utterly worthless to the Government until the road is built. The moment the road is built the half belonging to the United States immediately becomes valuable to the Government, so that the Government has just as much interest as has the State of Michigan in the completion of this road. The company promised to build the road in accordance with the provisions set forth in the amendment. The country is entirely wild, with not a habitation at present for one hundred miles, and yet the lands when opened are valuable. It is as greatly for the interest of the United States as it is for the interest of the State of Michigan that this road should be built and these lands opened up to settlers. If the Senate desire to take back the grant in case this company fails, and not permit the State of Michigan to build the road, of course they will vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont; but, if the Senate desire that the road shall be built, they will concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, which, in my judgment, will insure the building of the road. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Vermont will not prevail, and, if it does, I should prefer that the bill should fail.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I believe I understand the bill; I speak under the correction of those who have attended to it more particularly than I have. These lands were given in the first instance to the two States for the purpose of being appropriated by them to the service of the companies to make the two roads in question. That was done. It was then proposed, and is now proposed to extend the time within which the companies are to make the road. That is done by the bill as it now stands in part; but the House have provided that in the event that the companies do not make the road within the extended time the lands shall still be the lands of the two States, and be appropriated by them to the service of some other companies who will make the road. We want the road; that we desire to have made, and it was provided for by the original bill. If Congress thought it was right that these roads should be made in the first instance, and have not changed that opinion, why should not the amendment of the House of Representatives be acceded to? I suppose the effect would be this if we adopted the proposition of the honorable member from Vermont: he proposes that on the contingency of the companies not making the roads within the extended time the lands shall revert to the United States. The two States would come here again and ask that the lands be regranted to those States in order that the roads in part constructed should be completed, so that the improvement, which it is the policy of the United States to provide for, shall be executed. I should think that under these circumstances, therefore, it would be useless to adopt such a provision, and it would be contrary to the policy which governed Congress in the first instance when they granted the lands.

Mr. MORTON. As I before remarked, I have no special interest in this matter; but I have opposed from the first, and I shall continue to oppose, the system of granting away the public domain to railroad companies. The argument of my friend from Michigan and of the Senator from Maryland, who has just spoken, misses the point entirely. It is not whether a railroad shall be built through this vast waste of unoccupied lands in northern Michigan, but the question is this: this proviso allows the State of Michigan to apply the lands to another road between different points. If it be intended that the new company to whom these lands are to be given should construct the road between the same points, why not say so? That is the point. It clearly leaves the State of Michigan at liberty to build another road between different towns running in a different direction.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, it seems to me that my honorable friend from Vermont is laboring under a great misapprehension if he supposes there is anything contained in the House amendment which would convey these lands absolutely to the State of Michigan, whether the railroad is built or not within the time prescribed. I think it has no such effect, and if gentlemen will give their attention to the statutes I think I can satisfy them of it. All the grant is contained in the original act of 1856, and the words which grant the lands are, "That there is hereby granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of railroads" alternate sections of land, six to the mile, and one of the railroads for which this grant is "from Little Bay de Noquet to Marquette and thence to Ontonagon," with a proviso that the road is to be constructed and completed within ten years.

The State of Michigan has granted the lands to a company to build the road, and the road is not built. Now, Michigan and the railroad company both ask Congress to extend the time, and Congress have passed an act by which they declare not that they grant any new lands, but that the lands already granted shall not be forfeited on account of the road not being completed within the time specified in the statute of 1856, and then the Senate have added one proviso, and the House have added another. The Senate made a provision that this extension of time should be confined to two certain roads that are mentioned within this act, and now the House add a proviso that if the company to whom the State of Michigan have already granted the right to build this railroad shall fail to do it the State of Michigan may give it to another company, which shall build it under this "said grant." What grant? The grant contained in the act of 1856—a grant to build the road and to receive for the building of the road six sections of public land on each side. This provision is not a provision which grants; it is a proviso of limitation. The grant is all contained in the act of 1856, and there is no further power given in this except the extension of time, and the further power given to the State of Michigan, that if this one company to whom she has promised the grant shall fail to comply Michigan may give it to another company; but this other company takes no grant beyond the powers which are contained in the original act except as to time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to ask a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask my friend from Wisconsin if the act of 1856 does not provide that on a non-compliance with the conditions of the gift by the railroad company the land shall revert to the United States?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask what the reason is for making any change from that provision?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is no change made from the provision. The lands will revert to the United States unless the railroad be completed within the time to which we extend the period in which the company is to build the road. These lands do not go absolutely to the State of Michigan; that is not the construction of these acts; they only go to the State of Michigan conditioned that the road be built within a certain time. Here is the original grant requiring it to be built within ten years from 1856; but now they come in and ask Congress to extend the time. The Senate passed this bill, extending the time to 1872, and declaring that there should be no forfeiture of the lands under the original act if the road were completed by 1872. To that extension of time the Senate imposed one proviso, and now the House imposes another, to wit: that if the company to whom the grant has already been made shall not go on and build ten miles this year the State may declare it forfeited and give it to another company who will go on and build the road within the time, so as to secure the building of the road by 1872; and if the road is not built by 1872, by the terms of the original act—and there is nothing in these provisos, to the contrary—the lands will revert to the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question, as he seems to have great facility in answering?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to know what these last words in this House proviso mean, "may be granted by the State of Michigan to some other company in the same manner as if the said grant was now for the first time made to said State of Michigan."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to my honorable friend what I think that language means. It means that the said grant may be transferred to another company. What grant? It is this: the act of 1856 provided that "there be granted to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of railroads," one of which was "from Little Bay de Noquet to Marquette, and thence to Ontonagon," lands in alternate sections, "for six sections in width on each side of said roads," describing this road and others, with a proviso that they shall be built within ten years. That proviso that they shall be built within ten years is by the act which passed the Senate amended so as to extend the time as to this road to 1872, making, instead of ten years from the original grant, sixteen years; and the proviso that it may be given to another company is only on condition that the company to whom the grant is already made shall fail to do it. The State may then step in and give it to another company to comply with the terms of the act, precisely as if the grant was now made to the State of Michigan for the period, if you please, of six years. Michigan can grant it to one company or grant it to another, or, if one company fails, take it away from that company and give it to another, extending the time not at all beyond six years. My friend cannot claim that there is any extension of time beyond 1872 in these words. It is all limited.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will not consent that this bill, with the various amendments, shall go to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend will allow me to say that I am not in charge of the bill. My colleague can answer the question. I think it can be disposed of in a moment. ["Vote," "Vote."]

Mr. HOWE. I think we had better take a vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think we can dispose of it in a very few moments.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, thinks it is important that—

Mr. HARLAN. I am not, I will inform my friend, chairman of that committee, nor am I a member of it; but it occurred to me, as there was a conflict of opinion among the ablest lawyers of the Senate, that it would be well to refer the matter to a committee.

Mr. HOWE. We will settle that in a very few minutes.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to make a further suggestion. I have a bill that I desire a vote upon, which I think will not elicit debate; and there is another bill of great importance to be pressed; and, as there is a conflict of opinions as to the meaning of phraseology, I think it best to settle it in committee. I will not, however, press my motion if the vote can be taken soon.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think we can vote in five minutes. I think there is nothing more to be said.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will submit a motion that this bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I think that is the most rapid way.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope not. It is a clear case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know nothing about the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Morton, Sherman, Willey, and Wilson—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, McCreery, Morgan, Norton, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, Williams, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Thayer, and Van Winkle—19.

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] says that what he wants, if I understand him, is that these lands at the expiration of the time, 1872, shall revert to the United States unless the road is built. That, he thinks, is the construction of it now—that certainly is what the original House bill said; and now all that my amendment proposes to do is to say exactly that; to say that if they do not complete these spaces of road of ten miles in a year, at the end of the time granted, the land shall revert to the United States. What I propose to add in the place of what is said in the House proviso is the words, "the said lands shall be forfeited to the United States, as provided in section one of this act, at the expiration of said time." That is exactly, if I understand my friend from Wisconsin, what he says he wants and what he thinks the language means now. If it does mean that now, where is the objection to adding words which shall make it certain? We have had recent experience, and we shall have a good deal more if things go on, of the danger of leaving uncertain language in a bill when you can provide words that will make it certain; because, if you do that thing, a year or two hence the Congressional Globe will be looked at to find out what the law means instead of the statute itself.

Now, I put it to my friend from Wisconsin, where is the objection, on his own statement, to saying in distinct terms that if this company fails to build its ten miles a year in the regular way up to the last time, 1872, if that be the year, the lands shall then revert to the United States, just as the section of the House bill as it was sent to us in the first place said; just as we agreed to it; just as it stands in the section now, and just as all the laws have provided? If there is any objection to it I should like to have it stated. I understood him to say that that is what it means now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I do understand that the lands will revert to the United States if the road is not completed at the end of 1872. The House of Representatives have put on the bill this amendment, which will authorize the Legislature, in case the company from year to year fail to construct any one section of ten miles, to forfeit the rights of the company to whom the grant has been given, and to give the grant to a new company; and I suppose the House put that proviso in for the purpose of enabling the State of Michigan to compel the building of the road, as if one company do not build it they can give it to another. That I suppose to be the purpose of that amendment, and the amendment being that, it seems to me it is perfectly right and proper to pass the bill as it comes from the other House. If an amendment is now added, it must go back to the House again, and it is doubtful if there is any quorum of the House. There are various reasons why it is desirable to finish legislation of this kind at some reasonable time. I understand that the true construction of all the acts and amendments put together is not to extend the grant to the State of Michigan beyond 1872.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin has stated this case precisely as it stands. Not one inch of these lands accrues to the State of Michigan until the road is built. As the road is built the lands accrue to the State of Michigan, and at the end of the time to which this grant is extended of course they revert to the United States if the road be not constructed, because they never come in possession of the State of Michigan until the road is built. I hope the vote will be taken now, and that the amendment of the House will be concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that will not prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] proposes to strike out of the amendment of the House of Representatives the words "it shall be lawful for the Legislature of the said State of Michigan to declare the grant of land to said company to be forfeited, and to confer the said grant of land upon some other company in the same manner as if the said grant was now for the first time made to said State of Michigan," and in lieu thereof to insert "the said lands shall be forfeited to the United States, as provided in section one of this act, at the expiration of said time."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is a little difficult to understand exactly the meaning of the amendment attached to the bill by the House of Representatives. I should judge that, so far as the time is concerned, the State would have as much time to construct the road after it declares a forfeiture as it had when the original act was passed. Suppose in 1869 the company named in this bill fails to complete ten miles of road, and the State declares the grant to that company forfeited, then I understand that the State may give this land to another company, and that company will have the same time from that date for the completion of the road as the State had from the time when the original bill was passed.

Supposing that to be the meaning of the amendment, I do not know that I have any particular objection to it; because I do not conceive it to be very material as to the time in which these roads are constructed, further than that they ought to be constructed as soon as they conveniently can be for the good of the public, and there ought to be inducements for the construction of the roads with all possible expedition, and there ought to be penalties incurred if a company to whom lands are committed does not construct the road with as much dispatch as possible.

So far as the other question made by the Senator from Indiana is concerned, it seems to me that the amendment may be construed as the Senators from Wisconsin say; but it would be much more definite if the words "for the same purpose" were inserted in that amendment; so as to read "in the same manner and for the same purpose as specified in the original act." Then, of course, if the Legislature of that State, in case the company now constructing the road should forfeit the lands, should confer the grant on another company, they would be bound to use the lands for the same purpose for which the present company are bound to use them; and I would much rather have that amendment made to this section proposed by the House, if there be no objection. Of course that requires further action by the House; but this amendment as it stands now is indefinite, both as to time and as to object, and if there be any way in which more particularity can be attained I should think it would be very desirable, for as it now is it leaves this question open to a lawsuit that may hereafter arise between the conflicting companies under the legislation of the State.

Mr. POMEROY. I only wish to reply in a word to the Senator from Oregon, that if this line of road is not completed the State cannot take alternate sections and use them for the construction of any other line, because the alternate sections are from a definite line, and they will not know what sections to take if they build the road somewhere else. There is no alternate section to count from a given line, unless there is a line and unless a road is on that line. We cannot take a land grant where the sections are not named. The grant is only of alternate sections from a given line, and you cannot take those sections unless there is a line by which to designate the sections. Therefore these lands cannot be used for a road anywhere else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in reply to my friend from Oregon, and I shall occupy the time of the Senate but for a moment. This original act did not give these lands to the State of Michigan for the benefit of any specific railroad company, as would seem to be implied in this last House proviso, which is to give the State of Michigan the right to dispose of them to some other company. It gives them to the State of Michigan for the purpose of constructing a particular line of railway from one point to another; that is to say, so far as this part of the act is concerned, a railroad from Marquette to Ontonagon in that State. That was our grant to the State of Michigan, of land for a purpose and not of land for a party.

Now, the House of Representatives come in with this last proviso after we have passed their original bill providing for extending the time within which this purpose shall be accomplished, still leaving it to the State to select their own agents to do it with, and providing that if a particular company do not make use of that grant within a specified time then the State of Michigan shall have a right to dispose of the land to some other company at her free will and pleasure.

My friend from Oregon, therefore, will see that his remarks do not apply to the case as it really exists under the original grant. And all I ask the Senate to do is to provide that when at last they reach the ultimate period of time which Congress has consented to go to for the devotion of these lands to the purpose, Congress shall then have it in its power to provide what shall be done with the lands; and that, my friend from Wisconsin says, is exactly what he wants to accomplish, and hence I hope he will vote for my amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate, but the State of Michigan has no power to use one inch of the land except upon that particular line. All there is reserved in this bill to the State is that if their agent does not do this work she may select another. But should the amendment of the Senator from Vermont prevail, then I should desire that the bill might be defeated. The lands cannot be taken except upon that particular line, and not an inch of them can be taken except when the road is completed. This simply gives the State of Michigan power to compel that company who now have the grant to build the road, or, if they fail, to give it to some other company.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator one question for information. How much time will the State of Michigan have in which to complete this road from the time of the forfeiture of this grant to the company that is now engaged in the construction of the road? Suppose in 1869 this company fails to make ten miles of road, and the lands then revert to the State under this amendment, how long from that time will the State have in which to complete the road? That is the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Eighteen months—a year and a half.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that all?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is all. Sir, I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from Michigan how much time was allowed for the construction of this road when the grant was first made in 1856?

Mr. CHANDLER. Ten years.

Mr. MORTON. I ask whether if this grant is now to be considered as having been just made to a new company by the State of Michigan that company will not have ten years within which to complete it?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir. The time is extended eighteen months; one year and a half only.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Morgan, Morton, and Williams—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cole, Corbott, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Stewart, Thayer, and Yates—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, as one of this small and hopeless minority, I beg now to ask a question of the Senator having this bill in charge and having special knowledge. Is it the understanding of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] that the amendment, as it is, confines the ultimate application of this land to the construction of a road between the termini now existing?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I have not the slightest question about it. The Senator from Maryland, who has looked at the phraseology, has not the slightest doubt about it. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands says the same thing.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I ask the Senator whether there is any objection to inserting in the amendment words appropriate to render that meaning visible and unmistakable?

Mr. HOWE. All the objection I see to that in the world is, that if we experiment with new words there will be danger of meeting objections from somebody. If the Senator from New York would look at the phraseology used in the amendment and say that it was possible for the State of Michigan to apply that land to a new grant, then, he being a lawyer, I should admit there was propriety in trying some other words and seeing whether they were objected to; but I cannot think, if he will look at this language, that he will see it is possible to have any doubt.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Wisconsin, by informing me that he has no doubt himself and that the Senator from Maryland has no doubt, presents to me an alternative which I certainly ought not to accept when he proposes that I should presume to differ from such authority; and it seems to me that it is not practically very important that any member of the Senate should feel more or less confident on this subject. Certainly for abundant caution words can be inserted there which admit of no mistake whatever and will be open to no criticism except that they are surplusage. Now, if by the insertion of these words the concurrence of the Senate can be obtained and no right shall be impaired, I do not see why we should not amend in that way; and therefore I beg the Senator from Wisconsin, who knows so much more about it than I do and who can make the suggestion in better form than I can, to propose, without striking anything from the bill, to insert after the language, whatever it may be, allowing the State of Michigan to re-dispose of these lands, a proviso that that ultimate devotion of the lands shall be to this same purpose of constructing a road between these same termini. I do not think there can be any objection to that; and if the Senator will be kind enough to suggest such words as will be appropriate to that, I shall be glad; if he does not, I shall endeavor to do it myself, but the Senator can do it a great deal better.

Mr. HOWE. I will say to the honorable Senator from New York that I have been more or less familiar with statutes for a good many years, and in all that time I have never discovered any words that cannot be criticised, and therefore I should not like to undertake myself the task that he proposes, and I should ask him as a particular favor that he would not attempt it. But if the Senate are dissatisfied with this language, and if the Senate think that under this amendment the State of Michigan could take this grant and apply it to any road in the universe except the road provided for in the original grant, let them non-concur in this amendment, and let it go to a committee of conference. I wish they would concur; but if they will not, that is the cheaper way. All I care about its not going to a committee of conference is the loss of time, because we do not seem to be running very smoothly.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have so much confidence, not only in the judgment of the Senator, but in the correctness of his intentions always, that I will not propose any amendment about this matter, in deference to his expression of a wish on that subject. But if I may, without interfering with this bill, make the motion that was suggested for a committee of conference, with the understanding that I shall not be on that committee—I have no knowledge of the subject, and I should be very sorry to be on such a committee—I shall be very glad to submit that motion; for it seems to me that, having been doubted as to its meaning, that fact alone, which will appear upon the records, makes it worth while to put an end to all cavil when it is so easy by a slight variation, perhaps, to remove all doubt. I move, therefore, that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a committee of conference, with the understanding, as I said, that I am not myself to be a member of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope not. I hope the Senate will concur.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The precise question before the Senate is on the motion that we concur with the House amendment. That is the question pending. A motion to non-concur is only putting the same question in another form.

Mr. CONKLING. That is all true; but everybody understands that a double motion to non-concur and confer with the House is a very different thing from simply non-concurring and then leaving the bill to the mercy of the winds and waves after that. Therefore for brevity, and at the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, if any motion is to be made, it seems to me that is the true one.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from New York misunderstands me. I did not mean to suggest that motion at all; I asked him to consent that the Senate should come to a vote on the question of concurring; and if the Senate would not concur, as I hoped they would, then I said we could non-concur and let a committee of conference do what he asked me to do, which I did not like to do.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest that the first vote is on concurring. If we do not concur we can then non-concur and ask for a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the natural order.

Mr. CONKLING. I certainly withdraw the motion if Senators prefer it in that form. The only difference is that it gives us two votes to accomplish the same result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

SURVEY OF INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. HARLAN. I move now that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 170, and that the Senate proceed to consider it.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. HARLAN. It is a "bill to provide for deficiency of expenses incurred in the survey of Indian reservations."

Mr. HOWE. I understand that this is a motion to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to say, in justice to the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who is chairman of that committee, that he is not able to be in the Senate to-day by reason of ill health; and as I do not know anything about this matter myself, I shall have to ask the Senator from Iowa to justify his motion to the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. I conferred with the Senator from Maine on Saturday, and have his full concurrence in making this motion. The bill, in the first place, was examined by the Committee on Public Lands, reported on favorably, was considered in the Senate for some time, and on the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I consented that it should go to that committee for reconsideration, and it was sent to that committee last January. They have had it in their possession up to this time. They see no objections to the body of the bill; but they have written out some amendments—a trivial amendment, I believe, to the body of the bill, and some amendments to the amendments that the Senate agreed to when it was under consideration before. I do not make this motion, therefore, to disparage that committee in any way, but with the full concurrence of the chairman of that committee. It is a bill of some interest to people living in my State who have done this work, and the money is in the Treasury, the proceeds of the sales of the lands they surveyed, to pay for the work in pursuance of the provisions of treaties under which the surveys were made; but the First Comptroller has decided that he cannot make payment for this work until an appropriation shall be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I hope this will not be done. We have bills upon our table that are pressing upon us, and here is a bill not before us; a motion is made to discharge a committee which has under its consideration a bill relating to appropriations to pay for surveys. I know nothing of the particular bill, and have no objection to it, because I know nothing about it; but it has not been reported by the appropriate committee. Here we have a bill that is pressing upon us, and which everybody in the Senate, I believe, agreed on Saturday ought to be acted upon, and I hope the committee will not be discharged, but that we may proceed to consider the bill to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. DRAKE. I rise to what I believe is regarded as a privileged question at all times in the Senate. I move to reconsider the vote of the Senate on Saturday last upon the resolution of the House of Representatives to take a recess.

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose the Senator has a right to enter that motion as a privileged question; but I shall object to its consideration until the question is taken on the motion that I have made.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state as a reason why my friend from Iowa should not object to its consideration at this time, that in order to get the resolution before the Senate it is necessary to send a message to the House of Representatives asking them to return it to us. I doubt if there will be much objection in the Senate to reconsidering it for that purpose, for the purpose of bringing it back here; and I ask my friend from Iowa to withdraw his objection to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I would inquire if the resolution is out of the custody of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is out of the custody of the Senate. It has gone to the House. I suppose a motion requesting the return of the resolution would be in order.

Mr. DRAKE. I move, then, that the House of Representatives be requested to return the resolution to us.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not in order when another matter is pending.

Mr. DRAKE. We cannot reconsider it without that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not a motion to reconsider, but to request the return of a paper. The Chair is of opinion that that is always in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that, according to my recollection of the matter, the time fixed for adjournment by that resolution has already transpired.

Mr. SUMNER. It can be amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What object is there in getting that particular resolution? If it is desirable to take a recess, and you are going to amend that resolution, why not adopt a resolution here? I see no object in sending to the House to bring back a resolution which fixes a time already expired. We gain nothing by that. If the object of the Senator from Missouri is to move a recess, it can be attained just as well by passing a resolution without sending to the House for the other resolution.

Mr. DRAKE. Very well; I withdraw that motion, and move that when the two Houses adjourn this day they adjourn to meet on next Monday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That will not be in order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a privileged motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri may be misled by what was stated by the Senator from Illinois, because a new resolution cannot be introduced and acted upon on the same day against a single objection, and therefore the only mode to reach the question, if it is desired to reach it, is in the mode originally suggested.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I do not wish to make a single objection.

Mr. DRAKE. I will return to my original proposition, and move that a message be sent to the House of Representatives requesting the return to the Senate of the resolution providing for a recess.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. Is it now in order, before the resolution comes back, to move the reconsideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; that motion cannot be made until the resolution is here.

Mr. DRAKE. Then I will await its return.

EXPENSES OF INDIAN SURVEYS.

Mr. HARLAN. I hope the question will now be put on the motion I made a few moments ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on discharging the Committee on Appropriations from the further consideration of the bill mentioned by the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 170) to provide for deficiency of expenses incurred in the survey of Indian reservations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. HARLAN. The bill has been read through and amended heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will not be read unless the reading is called for by some Senator.

Mr. POMEROY. It has been read. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment agreed to by the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments heretofore made have all fallen by the recommitment of the bill, and consequently the Senate are acting on the original bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dislike to interfere with this bill or any other, because it seems to disturb our equable relations here; but I wish to suggest to the Chair that I do not know of any rule of parliamentary law by which an amendment agreed to, which becomes a part of a bill, goes out of it when it is referred. I beg the Chair to reconsider that question. I do not know that it is of any consequence on this particular bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that all amendments made to a bill, when it is recommitted, fall with the recommitment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After they have been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After they have been agreed to. The whole question is open to the committee, and when they report it back it is without amendment unless they make amendments anew.

Mr. POMEROY. This bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and under one of the new rules of the Senate went to the Committee on Appropriations, and I apprehend it is not true under our new rule, when we send a bill which has been agreed to in committee to the Committee on Appropriations, that then the amendments that have been agreed to fall. This sending of a bill to the Committee on Appropriations is a new feature of our legislation, and has been required only a short time by a rule. It is a mere matter of form, for the general protection of appropriation bills, that all bills, whether they are reported from one committee or another, if they appropriate money, shall now go to the Committee on Appropriations. This bill was referred, under the rule of the Senate and upon a motion to that effect, to the Committee on Appropriations. The committee have had it before them for some time, and have agreed to certain amendments to the amendments that were sent to them. Now, if the amendments fall by the reference to that committee, how can you report from this Committee on Appropriations amendments to those amendments, which they have done?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose the object of sending the bill to the committee was to leave it all open to them to adopt the amendments or amend them as they saw fit. It is all open to the committee, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As this is a question of considerable practical importance, I hope the Chair will permit me to make a suggestion, although the Chair has suggested its opinion. It appears to me to be plain—and I think the Chair will find the parliamentary law is so—that after an amendment is adopted it ceases to be an amendment and becomes a part of the text of the bill. An amendment that is not adopted, on a reference of course falls, and the committee can report anything that it pleases; but when an amendment is once agreed to it becomes just as much a part of the bill as if it had been written in the bill itself. When sent to a committee I do not deny but what the committee can make an amendment to that, which is an entirely different thing. I say this with all respect to the Chair; but I think I am right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a rule on that subject. Perhaps the Chair may be mistaken in the construction of the rule; but that is the idea of the Chair.

Mr. HARLAN. No appeal has been taken from the decision.

Mr. POMEROY. The rule relates to all general appropriation bills. My own opinion is, although it was not the opinion of the Senate, that this bill did not properly come under that rule, because it was not a general appropriation bill, but a sort of special appropriation bill for a distinctive service—surveys. This being a special appropriation bill, I think it did not come under the rule relating to general appropriation bills; but the Senate, when the bill was up before, thought otherwise, and sent it to the Committee on Appropriations. Now, I apprehend it was proper for that committee, after the bill had been sent to them amended, to suggest any other amendment, and I have one which is an amendment to an amendment heretofore agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. This bill is in Committee of the Whole, and, as I understand it, we can gain time by reoffering the amendments, if the Senate should think it advisable to put them on, though I hope the amendments may all fail that were put on in the Senate when the bill was under consideration heretofore. If it is in order, I move to amend the bill as indicated in the paper which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the desire of the Chair that the question which has been raised should be set right.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have a distinct understanding, in the first place, whether the amendments agreed to by the Senate heretofore are a part of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what we wish to ascertain, and we wish to have it decided right by the rules. I do not think this matter is provided for in the written rules of the Senate, but it is in the general principles of parliamentary law, as the Chair understands, that the reference of a bill with amendments to a committee opens the whole subject to the consideration of that committee, and they can report it back with those amendments or any others that they see fit to make. They are not bound by the amendments that were even agreed to at the time it was referred.

Mr. POMEROY. This bill does not come under that rule, because it has not been reported back. The committee have been discharged from its further consideration by a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may change it.

Mr. POMEROY. And it comes to us now in precisely the same shape that it was before it went to the committee at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the rule be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 90 of Jefferson's Manual is found the following:

"After progress in amending a bill in quasi committee, a motion may be made to refer it to a special committee. If the motion prevails it is equivalent in effect to the several votes that the committee rise, the House resume itself, discharge the Committee of the Whole, and refer the bill to a special committee. In that case the amendments already made fall."

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no doubt about that, because the amendments were adopted there in committee and not by the body. Here these amendments were agreed to by the body itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not take into consideration one circumstance: in this case the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the bill, which left it probably as it went to them. The Chair will consider the amendments as standing, because the committee have been discharged, have had nothing to do with the bill. It therefore comes back in the same form that it went to them; but, if they had reported it back, it would have been subject to their remodeling from its foundation.

Mr. POMEROY. That being the case, the bill being before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment, I desire to move an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read. The amendments heretofore made will be considered as adopted.

Mr. HARLAN. Before that amendment is put I desire to amend the text of the bill as originally introduced.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill in section one, line five, by striking out "$26,862 93" and inserting "$27,980 51"; so that the section will read:

That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $27,980 51, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay balance due for the survey of lands embraced in the Osage Indian reservation and the Cherokee neutral lands, in the State of Kansas, under contracts dated respectively August 14 and 16, 1866, the said sum to be returned to the Treasury out of the proceeds of the sale of said lands, as provided by treaties with said Indians.

I make this motion in pursuance of a letter written by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. If it should be adopted it will be the exact amount found to be due.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend the bill in section three, lines two and three, by striking out "$62,015" and inserting "$39,014 63." The amount appropriated by this section as it was adopted by the Senate I have found is too large, and this amendment reduces it about one half. All this money is to be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, and there has been received up to this time from the sales of the lands $23,000. I offer this amendment, reducing the sum appropriated from $62,015 to $39,014 63.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the third section read as it will stand if amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $39,014 63, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not heretofore appropriated, to pay for the survey of the Osage Indian trust lands ceded to the United States under treaty concluded September 29, 1865, upon a contract made with the General Land Office under date of September 18, 1866, and another contract for another portion of said trust lands, dated May 28, 1867; which survey is according to the provisions of the second article of treaty concluded with said tribe September 29, 1865.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move further to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,362 04, to pay the balance due for the survey of lands embraced in the Omaha and Winnebago Indian reservations in the State of Nebraska, under contract dated August 14, 1866, as provided by a treaty with the Omaha Indians, and authorized by the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866.

The Senate will remember that this matter was before them some time ago when this bill was under consideration, previous to its reference to the Committee on Appropriations. They have agreed to it, and I think the Senate has no objection to inserting it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope I shall not be thought as interfering with a matter that does not belong to me if I ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands how much of the money that is appropriated by this bill is due to these contractors now by force of the contract, and how much of it is due and payable out of the proceeds of sales which have not yet been made?

Mr. POMEROY. I understand it all to be due to the contractors now; that is, the work is all done, and their accounts are in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend does not understand my question. My question is, how much of this money, by contract with the surveyor, was to be paid out of the proceeds to be derived from the sales of the lands where the lands have not yet been sold and the proceeds have not come into our possession.

Mr. HARLAN. I can answer the Senator's question, with the leave of my friend from Kansas. Nearly all of it will be paid ultimately from the proceeds of the sales of the lands. A large part of it is now in the Treasury. This embraces several tracts of land. It embraces what are known as the Cherokee neutral lands, and there is in the Treasury now, and has been for nearly two years, $25,000 from the proceeds of the sale of those lands. It also embraces a tract of land on the east end of the Osage reservation. Sales of those lands have been made to a sufficient amount to pay the whole amount included in this appropriation bill.

Then, with regard to another item, the second section of the bill, being an amendment which was agreed to by the Senate some time since, a considerable portion has been paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the lands, which induced the Senator from Kansas to make the amendment which he has suggested. There is no mode of paying the money included in the last amendment suggested by the Senator from Minnesota for paying for the Omaha reservation. It is a direct appropriation from the Treasury, and there is no means of restoring it to the Treasury again; but ultimately the whole of the residue will be paid from the proceeds of the sales of the lands that belong to the Indians.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand my friend from Iowa to mean that this appropriation, all of it, is now payable out of the proceeds already received, except the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARLAN. No, sir; not the whole of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I asked was to get what share of it was being advanced by the Government now and what share is already received from the proceeds of sales, which, by the contracts, are to furnish the money to pay with.

Mr. HARLAN. All that part of it included in the original bill is now in the Treasury as proceeds from the sales of the lands, as I understand from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and they are receiving from day to day from the sales of the lands to cover the expenses included in the second section of the bill. A part of it has been received and part has not been, but is coming in as proceeds of the sales of lands. For the last section I believe nothing ever will come in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much money do we appropriate, then, for which as yet we have received nothing?

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose about thirty or forty thousand dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that money by the contract with the contractors was payable out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, was it?

Mr. HARLAN. The contracts run in this way, to be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of these lands unless sooner appropriated by Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then Congress was not obliged to appropriate?

Mr. HARLAN. Not at all, if they choose not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole. Shall the vote be taken on the amendments collectively or separately. ["All together."]

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HARLAN. I rise to a personal explanation, and I ask the general consent of the Senate to make it. I desire the Secretary to read a paragraph from the newspaper which I send to the desk.

Mr. POMEROY. What newspaper?

Mr. HARLAN. The Baltimore Sun.

Mr. CONNESS. Is it an editorial or correspondence?

Mr. HARLAN. Correspondence.

The Chief Clerk read as follows from the Baltimore Sun of to-day:

"While the doubt and anxiety existed on Friday night about the position of Senator WILLEY upon impeachment Senator HARLAN telegraphed Bishop Simpson, of Philadelphia, in these words: 'I fear Brother WILLEY is lost.' To which the bishop replied: 'Brother WILLEY professes to be a Christian. Brother WILLEY has a soul to be saved. He cannot barter away his soul and imperil the country. Pray with Brother WILLEY.' And it is said Brother HARLAN prayed with Brother WILLEY."

[Laughter.]

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I have never, since I have had the honor of occupying a seat here, noticed anything said of myself in the newspapers, and I would not now if I alone were referred to. I do not refer to this now on account of my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] for he knows, as I do, that there is not a word of truth in this statement; but I wish to say a word in justice to the eminent gentleman referred to by this correspondent of the Baltimore Sun. I have had no communication, either orally or in writing or by telegraph, with that distinguished citizen since the impeachment investigation began, and never on that subject at any time or place.

Mr. JOHNSON. You do not suppose anybody believes it?

Mr. HARLAN. I supposed no one did believe it; but I feared it might wound his feelings.

NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 286 and act upon it at this time. It will take but a few moments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 286) to incorporate the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America.

The Chief Clerk commenced the reading of the bill, but was interrupted by Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the further reading of the bill I move to postpone its consideration with a view of proceeding to the consideration of the bill which I indicated this morning, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress. I have sought all the morning to obtain the floor to move to take up that bill. There certainly was a disposition on Saturday to take action upon it, and there is every reason why we should act upon it. The bill that is now under consideration is for the incorporation of a company. There can be no special urgency about it. It may wait. But there is an urgency that a Legislature assembled at Little Rock, in Arkansas, and awaiting our action, should have some recognition. We informed the people of Arkansas that if they would organize a State government in conformity to certain conditions which we proposed, we would recognize that State government. They have undertaken to form one, have been engaged in it for months, have called a convention, have formed a constitution, have submitted that constitution to the people, and it has been ratified. The Legislature has assembled. It has elected Senators and has also ratified the constitutional amendment. Now, can we refuse to take action in regard to that state of things? The House of Representatives have acted. They have sent us a bill upon the subject. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It has been reported back by the committee favorably. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day sought to pass the bill without a reference at all, such was the urgency; and now, after it has been referred and considered and reported upon, I do not know what excuse there is for non-action.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us get a vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, I move to postpone the bill under consideration and proceed to the consideration of the bill which I have indicated.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I trust that will not be done. The bill which I have called up has been a long time upon our table. I reported it some six weeks or two months ago from the Committee on the District of Columbia. The parties who are interested are deeply concerned to have the bill passed at once. It will take but a few minutes to dispose of it, I think. It cannot lead to much discussion, if any; and I suppose the gentleman from Illinois knows very well that the bill which he urges is of such a nature that he will hardly get it through in one or two days. It is not to be passed in a hurry; it is not to be passed in an hour; he will find opposition to the bill; and it seems to me that we might as well pass this little bill and then take up his bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In reply to that suggestion I desire to say, if there is opposition let us meet it. There has always been opposition to these reconstruction measures. But if there is to be opposition to this bill, to last an hour or two hours, or a day or two days, for one I am ready to begin at once. Let us see what the opposition is. If the bill is not perfect, perfect it; but let us commence it and adhere to it until we finish it. I certainly think it is a measure that Congress is committed to, to give consideration to at least; and I will say that the Senator from New Hampshire is bound to support it. I have no opposition to the bill which he has called up. I would not have made this motion if I could have obtained the floor to move to take up the bill before. I have made several efforts this morning to obtain the floor, but was unfortunate; and this is the only way by which I could submit the motion to the Senate. It seems to me that we are committed before the country. The condition of things in Arkansas is such, as we understand it, that disorders prevail; the people do not know what government to recognize; do not know whether this Legislature which is assembled and has elected Senators is the legitimate Legislature of the State; that Legislature is waiting; the members elected by the people to the House of Representatives and by the Legislature to this body are here in Washington. What reason can be given for non-action on this bill? In my judgment it affords no reason to say that this measure will encounter opposition. I have no reason to suppose that there will be any less opposition to-morrow than to-day; and having been from the beginning earnestly in favor of an early reconstruction of these States, believing it the most desirable and important business upon which Congress can enter, for one I am unwilling to lay it aside on the suggestion that opposition is to be made to it.

During the course of Mr. TRUMBULL's remarks a message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, returning, in accordance with the request of the Senate, the resolution providing for a recess of Congress from the 16th to the 25th instant.

Mr. DRAKE. I think, sir, that in the matter of the resolution which has just been returned to us by the House of Representatives there is a very good and sufficient reason why the motion of the Senator from Illinois should not prevail at this moment of time. I ask him, therefore, to withdraw his motion for the moment to let us determine what our action shall be upon this resolution just returned to us. If we shall not agree to the resolution, then we shall have full opportunity for taking up the bill to which the Senator from Illinois refers; and if we do agree to it, of course that bill cannot be taken up now with any advantage during the remainder of this day's session. I ask the Senator from Illinois to withhold his motion for the moment until we can determine what we will do about that resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That would only be taking the vote in another form. Let us take up the bill to admit Arkansas, or take the vote upon that motion. If that is voted down, then, of course, the Senator from Missouri can call up his motion. If the Senate takes up the Arkansas bill it will be an indication that they are disposed to go on with it, and, of course, that they will not adopt the resolution referred to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the bill now before the Senate until to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I am as anxious as the Senator from Illinois to have Arkansas come into the Union as one of the States and be represented here, provided it can come in properly; and I trust that it will meet with no opposition in the Senate when it is properly presented; and I trust especially that it will find no opposition from the Senator from Illinois; but the bill which I have called up might have been passed during the time in which he has been speaking here and urging his bill. It will not take five minutes to dispose of this bill, and the parties interested are exceedingly earnest that it should be passed. Let us get it out of the way and then take up the bill of the Senator from Illinois; it will then be unobstructed.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois states that it is important that the bill admitting the State of Arkansas should be passed as soon as possible, and his statement is to me sufficient evidence of the truth of the fact alleged by him; but I would say to him as a practical man that, in my judgment, the bill would become a law at an earlier period if it should be postponed until next week and not acted upon now. He knows perfectly well that if the bill is now brought up before the Senate it will require some consideration. There will be, I presume, no factious opposition to it; I have no disposition to make any; but of course it is a bill which will require examination and discussion. It will take a day or two probably to pass it at the shortest. Then it goes to the President. He has ten days within which to consider it, if he sees fit to take them. What he will do I do not know; but I have no doubt that if this bill were to be postponed until next week and then passed, as it probably would be after not more than one day's examination, it could immediately become a law and the State of Arkansas could be admitted, and those evils of which the Senator speaks could at once come to an end. In my judgment he will accomplish the purpose which he has in view at a more early day by allowing this subject to pass over for a week.

The Senator must know perfectly well—it cannot have escaped his attention—that the question alluded to last week, mentioned as an important question by the distinguished Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] the question whether Senators from Arkansas, provided they are admitted on this floor, can become members of the court of impeachment, is a question which may be raised.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course they can be.

Mr. DIXON. I know there are Senators here who think they cannot be prevented from voting; that they would have a right to take the oath as members of that court of impeachment. There are Senators who do not think they ought to do it; who think it would be an improper and indelicate act, but still that it would be out of the power of the Senate to prevent it. That is the opinion, I know, of some Senators. Under these circumstances it does seem to me it is not safe to press the measure at this time, and I think the Senator will gain nothing in point of time by doing so, but, on the contrary, would produce a favorable practical result by postponing it until next week.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator from Connecticut has proved to his own satisfaction, if not to that of others, what I thought was an impossible proposition, that the way to hasten the passage of a bill was to postpone it, not to take it up. I had thought sometime since, after this discussion went on, that the Senate ought to be allowed to vote upon it; that they sufficiently understood whether they should go on with the consideration of a bill to organize a corporation in the District of Columbia or take up a bill to admit a State to representation in Congress; and I hope we shall be allowed to vote upon that proposition. I am in favor of taking up the Arkansas bill and working upon it. When it shall be taken up it may be temporarily laid over to consider this adjournment resolution and let the Senate vote upon that. Then the Arkansas bill will be the order of business until it is finished, and when we adjourn to-day, if we meet to-morrow it will be the business in order then, and if we adjourn for a week it will be the business in order when we meet then.

The question of whether the Senators from this new State should vote upon the trial that has just passed or is yet pending has been, as I think, very irregularly intruded upon the Senate heretofore, and the honorable Senator from Connecticut continues it to-day, although it is an established fact that the admission of those Senators could make no change whatever in the result. Besides, it is almost impossible that they should get here at all or be received until that vote shall have been taken. I hope that that view of the case will be kept out of the discussion entirely. Nobody contemplates such a thing.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator says it is impossible that the votes of those two Senators, if they were admitted and sworn as members of the court of impeachment, should affect the result. I desire to inquire of him how it is impossible that those votes should affect the result?

Mr. CONNESS. I refer the Senator, for I will not repeat them, to the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] when this subject was last up. I think they were conclusive in the case.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator will find that it is false arithmetic when he comes to look at it. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the bill under consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe now that the two propositions that are antagonized to each other are a proposition in reality, though not in form, for an adjournment over for a week, which the honorable Senator from Missouri intends to bring forward, and the proposition to take up the Arkansas bill and proceed to its consideration. Now, sir, I should like to know why, when we have once settled this matter of an adjournment, and I thought upon a very full discussion, that took up several hours, if I recollect aright, the proposition for adjournment over is again brought forward. What is the object of it? It was sufficiently stated on Saturday that the business of the body was very much in arrear. Everybody knows that it is very late in the season. Everybody knows that we are considerably behind the House of Representatives in our business, and that if we would get through in any decent season we must be doing business. The idea that we cannot do business this week on account of the excitement of our minds, and that we can do it next week, when we shall have had an additional dose of excitement, is a little remarkable to me. I am apprehensive that we shall have just as much excitement next week as we have had this and as we have now. If this matter of impeachment is to go forward with an adjournment from week to week, acting upon one article and then adjourning over for another week to act upon another article, and so on to the end of the eleven, I apprehend it will take some time before we get through with the business sufficiently to get rid of the excitement under which we are said to be laboring.

Now, sir, I hope that we shall proceed with the business of the Senate. I am in the condition that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] described himself to be the other day, and that is, always opposed to these adjournments over. We had one at the beginning of the session for ten days or a fortnight; I do not remember the length of it.

Mr. MORTON. Twenty days.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Twenty days. That was to adjourn over the Christmas holidays.

Mr. CONNESS. Sixteen days.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And we now propose at this very late period, in the latter part of May, to adjourn over again. When are we to conclude business, or are we to conclude nothing at all? Everybody knows that the Calendar is encumbered now just as much as it ever was at a long session with most important bills. Hardly any of the appropriation bills have passed this body. I do not consider myself particularly responsible about it one way or the other, for I have been here in my seat every day and ready to proceed with business; but gentlemen must consider that we are getting into very warm weather, and that it is important to make progress in the business of the country.

What will be the result if we continue to act in this way? Why, sir, we all know we have a presidential election coming on in the fall. Very soon members will be anxious to be at home. It is hard enough to do business in the long session preceding a presidential election at any time; and now we have got to be so late in the session that gentlemen will find themselves exceedingly crowded, and the result will be that all the important legislation of this session will go over, and we shall do none at all, substantially. We may pass the appropriation bills, because it will not do to adjourn until they are passed; but if there is anything else of any consequence that gentlemen have on hand they will find that business cannot be attended to.

I hope, Mr. President, that we shall adhere to the resolution we adopted on Saturday, and that is, refuse to adjourn, if for nothing else for appearance sake, to look as if we were disposed to do something in the way of business for the benefit of the country, whether we are or not; at any rate to hold out the appearance of a disposition to labor and to let things stand before the country in their proper shape.

As to this Arkansas bill, I am not particularly interested in its being taken up to-day or at any other day. I think we ought to act upon it. But, sir, as it pleases some gentlemen to refer to me as an obstructionist always, I should like to see how the anti-obstructionists vote in this business. We have been told that it is very important to act upon the bill for the admission of Arkansas, and I accede to the importance of it. My honorable friend from Nevada [Mr. Nye] made a most eloquent speech here the other day on the subject of acting now, instantly, on the admission of Arkansas without a moment's delay; and we have heard from gentlemen time after time the extreme importance of getting these States into the Union just as quick as possible. I should like to see some action in that direction, and not an adjournment over for a week the moment we touch the point where there can be some action. Why, sir, it has been said, I have no doubt with very great truth, that the condition of these States is such as requires that they should be under a regular government at once, have a government in operation, in force. We know that there can be no protection afforded by any government until it is admitted into the Union and recognized as the legal and constitutional government of the State, and every day that that is put off they are left precisely in the same condition that they are now. Why not, then, take up the bill, if gentlemen are so anxious, and act upon it?

As to the other question which my honorable friend from Connecticut suggests, I have no apprehension about it one way or the other. I should not envy the condition of that member of the Senate who should propose to administer the oath as a member of the court of impeachment to either of those gentlemen if they should come here as Senators from Arkansas. Still less should I envy the condition of any one who proposed to take the oath and to act as a member of the court under such circumstances. It may be. We see strange things every day, and that may present itself; but I have no apprehension about it, for I have not the slightest question there is no power, no constitutional right of any kind, that would allow members, admitted under such circumstances, after a trial was had and over, passing into a judgment, to vote; and I have no apprehension that any man will so commit his reputation, if it is of any value to him, as to propose himself to take the oath under such circumstances.

Mr. CONNESS. If the honorable Senator will allow me to say so, nobody in this body has yet suggested such a thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am answering the honorable Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes; and it will be observed, if the Senator will permit me to say it, that all the suggestions which have been made on that subject have come from a certain side of that case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Precisely; and I am saying that I do not believe that any such proposition will be made. I cannot believe it for a moment. I do not impute it to anybody. I said I should not envy the position of any member of this court who should propose such a thing, and still less should I envy the position of any man who should propose himself to act in such a case as that. Why, sir, the country would cry shame upon the very suggestion of the proposition. I have not the slightest apprehension of anything of the kind.

Therefore, if Senators are desirous that the State of Arkansas should come in here, as I am and as I suppose we all are, why not take up that bill and act upon it, instead of proposing at once to adjourn over a week, and have no question or delay in the matter; or if Senators do not choose to take up that bill—I do not speak of that particularly—take up some other; take up this question of the organization of an insurance company in the District of Columbia, which is so important that my honorable friend from New Hampshire thinks no delay can be had upon it because the gentlemen interested in it want to be active in their insurance business?

Mr. CONNESS. And the Senator has a jail to construct.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have got a bill here that would have saved the country some thousands of dollars if it had been passed before, when it was defeated by one objection and I could not bring it up, and that is, for the erection of a jail in the District of Columbia. We are losing time every day, if we are to proceed with it. It is under contract; the contract has been delayed; and we have a bill here to set that right and to proceed with that matter at once. I have asked the Senate once to consider it. I propose to ask them again. We can do it this week. Our minds are not so dreadfully excited that we cannot pass a good bill for the erection of a jail in the District of Columbia, and also the bill of my friend from New Hampshire for the organization of an insurance company in the District of Columbia. We can pass them both this week, notwithstanding this intense excitement which it is said unfits us for business; and I dare say there are several other bills as important as either that we could act upon if we will not take up the case of Arkansas and act upon that. Therefore, I appeal to Senators again to go on with the business of the session and let us do something at any rate, or manifest a disposition to do something at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the bill under consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What bill is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "A bill to incorporate the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America."

Mr. DIXON. I have only one word to say in regard to the subject to which I alluded, called forth by the comments of the Senator from California. I was not the first to introduce it. It was introduced by a Senator who knows better than I do what is proper in this body; and inasmuch as he had introduced it I made some remarks following him; but I thought, I must confess, that it was perfectly proper for him to say what he did and for me to say what I did about it.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Maine, who has just spoken, that there would be no right on the part of members admitted as members of the Senate subsequent to this time to be sworn as members of the court of impeachment. I agree with him that it would be a shame and a disgrace, and it would be so considered by the whole people of this country; but still, as a legal question, I do know that there are Senators in this body, able and distinguished men and lawyers of ability, who think that if these Arkansas gentlemen were admitted as Senators of the United States there is no power here to refuse them the oath; and moreover there are some Senators who believe they would be compelled to act. That being the case, it seems to me improper that such a question as that should ever be raised; but still I am so far satisfied with the declaration of the honorable Senator from Maine on this subject of his opinion, and so far believing that that opinion would, to a very great extent, control the opinion of the Senate, I am, for myself, willing to drop that subject. I have accomplished the purpose that I had in view.

Mr. CONNESS. I am very glad that the Senator is willing to drop that subject. I was just about to say that I had thought the days of belief in ghosts and hobgoblins had passed away; that in this day of railroads and steam it was no place for belief in them; but the honorable Senator from Connecticut seems to be frightened at the ghosts of two Arkansas Senators, and he will continue to discuss them. I hope we have heard the last of that subject. I do not know why it should have been introduced at all.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not feel that it would be proper at this moment of time to respond to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine, for the question upon which the most of his remarks were made is not now before the Senate. The question simply is, whether the bill presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, which was in process of being read, shall be laid aside to take up the bill which the Senator from Illinois proposes to take up, and upon that I appealed to the Senator from Illinois to withhold his motion until we could act upon the matter of the resolution returned to us from the House. The Senator from Illinois did not see fit to accede to that request; and now the simple question is, whether the Senate will decline at this moment to sustain the resolution of the Senator from Illinois in order to enable us to determine a matter of mere proceeding between the two Houses, which is now lying upon the table; and the Senator seeks to supplant the action upon that, as I understand it, by taking up the Arkansas bill and to throw out the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire, too. I do not wish to discuss the matter. I am perfectly ready to vote upon the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, and I think the sooner we vote upon it the better, for the reason that I understand it is extremely difficult to keep a quorum in the House of Representatives, and we had better act upon the other proposition speedily and let them know what we say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The opinion of the Chair is, that these double motions are not in order. Postponing one bill for the purpose of taking up another is well enough in argument, but I believe there is no rule for it. The question is on postponing the bill now under consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. For the purpose I announced.

Mr. DIXON. The Senate will excuse me for saying one word more. The Senator from California, when he was up the last time but one, said that the subject was introduced by what he was pleased to call "the other side," I suppose meaning those who voted—

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not say "the other side."

Mr. DIXON. That was the substance, perhaps not the very words; but the idea was that they introduced it.

Mr. CONNESS. I said "a certain side."

Mr. DIXON. That he said in reply to the Senator from Maine. Now, I wish to remind the Senator from California that two of the leading newspapers of the country which have taken up this subject and assumed to themselves the power of judging in this case, and I will name them—the New York Tribune and the Washington Chronicle—have both, if I am not very much mistaken, suggested the idea that these Senators should be admitted, and that they should be sworn as members of the court of impeachment and act upon this case.

Mr. CONNESS. It is very evident that the honorable Senator has been frightened from some source or other. I am very sorry to find that at this time his fears are so much stronger than his courage.

Mr. DIXON. I do not claim to have the courage of that Senator, but I have sufficient to do my duty.

Mr. SHERMAN. This discussion shows the folly of attempting to arrange the order of business by a motion to postpone, because this motion to postpone, if it is carried now, would lead to a struggle between two other motions, both of which would be pressed upon us, one by the honorable Senator from Illinois and the other by the Senator from Missouri. Now, if there is no objection to the passage of the bill before us, it does seem to me the most orderly way would be to dispose of the bill in which the Senator from New Hampshire takes an interest, and which is undoubtedly for a good object, the organization of an insurance company. I see no objection to going on and passing that bill. We should have passed it in one fourth the time which has been occupied in debating the motion as to whether we shall take up two other subjects.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is always the case.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is always the case on a motion to postpone a bill, unless it is made in antagonism to the bill itself. If a Senator is opposed to a bill a motion to postpone is a legitimate mode of opposition; but where all are willing to have the bill pass it seems to me a motion to postpone to take up another bill creates confusion. I am in favor of the bill the Senator from Illinois desires to take up, and wish to vote upon it, and should like to vote upon it this evening; but it seems to me the better way would be to go on and finish the bill before us, and then vote with him to take up his bill, and stand by it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, a long practice in the Senate since I have been here has prevailed to move to postpone one bill for the purpose of taking up another, and it has been understood that when the one bill was postponed the other would come up. I do not think ordinarily the two motions have been put, but doubtless they may be. There was no other way to get a vote upon taking up the Arkansas bill. The Senator from Ohio says he will vote to take it up when this bill is disposed of. I sought to get it up when the bill was disposed of which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] had in charge, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] obtained the floor and moved to take up another bill. I waited until that was through. I struggled for the floor again, but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] obtained the floor and moved to take up another bill. If I wait until that is through the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] will move to take up another subject. There is no assurance that we can ever get at a bill under such circumstances, and in order that the Senate might indicate by its vote whether it was disposed to consider the bill in reference to Arkansas I moved, as the only means by which I could get the floor, to postpone the bill before us after its reading had been proceeded with for some time. As I was entitled to the floor upon that bill, after obtaining the floor I moved to lay it aside, and announced the purpose to be to take up the bill for the recognition of the State government of Arkansas. Now, it is for the Senate to decide whether it will postpone the bill before it or not, my purpose being to call up the bill for the recognition of the State of Arkansas, which I suppose will be the next question, if this motion prevails, provided the Chair should think it necessary to put the additional motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the present bill until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that question, to see whether we can get up the Arkansas bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Connors, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morton, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Wilson, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, Ripston, and Yates—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Harlan, McCroery, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Vickers, and Wade—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Saulsbury, and Thayer—10.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move to take up the Arkansas bill, if it needs another motion.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope that that motion will not be adopted. I hope that we shall at least tell the House of Representatives what we will do on the resolution they sent us back here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right.

Mr. SUMNER, (to Mr. DRAKE.) Why not move your resolution?

Mr. DRAKE. A motion is already pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill proposed to be taken up will be read by its title.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest that the honorable Senator from Missouri can amend the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DRAKE. Is it in order to move an amendment to that motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing in order until the Senate know what the bill is that is to be taken up.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up that bill at this time for consideration.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask whether it is in order to amend the motion of the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the amendment proposed?

Mr. DRAKE. I move to amend it by substituting the taking up of the resolution returned to us from the House of Representatives this day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that that is not in order.

Mr. DRAKE. Very well.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to take up.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand the Senator from Illinois says that if this bill is taken up he will give way for the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, and if that is the case I suppose there is no objection to taking it up.

Mr. DRAKE. If the honorable Senator from Illinois says that, I will withdraw any opposition to the coming up of this bill now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not wish to make any agreement by which to favor this adjournment. I cannot prevent the Senator from Missouri, after this bill is up and under consideration, moving to lay it aside and take up his resolution. It is not in my power to do so.

Mr. DRAKE. Then, if the Senator will not do that, I hope the motion will not prevail.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well. If the Senate refuse to consider the Arkansas bill I cannot help it. I want a vote upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Illinois has no right to say that the Senate will not consider the Arkansas bill because they think that a matter which is really a question of privilege should be first decided. It is due to the House of Representatives, as we have sent to them to recall this resolution, that we should act upon it and inform them what we really mean to do; and it ought not to be taken as any evidence of opposition to the Arkansas bill that we prefer to do the other thing first. I shall, therefore, vote against taking up the Arkansas bill until we settle the other question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Illinois on the table, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution of the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that in order? Is it in order to move to lay such a motion on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill. There is nothing to lay on the table. It is all on the table. The question is on taking it up.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As the question was not discussed at all and the Chair decided instantly, I apprehend the Chair fell into an error in saying that it was out of order when a motion is made to take up one bill for a Senator to move to amend that motion by taking up another bill; for in that way we antagonize the one against the other, and the Senate decides which it will take up. I understand the Chair to hold that when a bill is pending the only motion that can be made is to postpone that bill; but you cannot make a motion to postpone that bill and take up another bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is not in order unless he takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The questions are entirely independent of each other, and the rule is in such cases that the first made is the first put. They are independent motions entirely. One is not an amendment of the other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the proposition is to antagonize the one against the other for consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senate all have the same purpose. We wish to dispose of the question of a recess, and the Senator from Illinois, although he does not wish to have the recess, I take it does not desire to prevent the Senate passing judgment on that question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Of course not.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I suggest that we allow the Arkansas bill to be taken up, and then, by general consent, it be laid aside long enough to dispose of the recess resolution. Then, whether that prevails or not, the Arkansas bill will be the order of business; it will be the order of the day for to-morrow, or on the meeting of the Senate after the recess, if a recess should be had.

Mr. MORTON. There is manifest propriety under the circumstances in disposing of the resolution of the House of Representatives, which we have just recalled; and I hope that this waste of time will be stopped by the Senator from Illinois allowing the question of adjournment to be taken up. We are frittering away time here by the hour.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me the most direct and practical way would be for the Senator from Illinois to withdraw his motion; but if he perseveres in it the next direct and practical way is for the Senate to vote it down in order to proceed with the consideration of the House resolution. That being disposed of, then the way would be clear for the consideration of other business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Being myself opposed to a recess, thinking it the duty of the Senate to go on with its business, I do not propose to enter into any arrangement to bring it about. It would be a very strange proceeding in the Senate if those in favor of a measure were to consent to lay it aside to bring up a measure which would defeat it, for the present at any rate. The Senate has ordered the yeas and nays upon the motion to take up the bill to recognize the State government in Arkansas, and let us vote upon it. I shall be entirely content with whatever vote the Senate gives in reference to it. If the Senate does not think it proper to take it up, very well. If it does take it up, it will still be competent for the Senator from Missouri to interpose his motion. I can enter into no agreement for it; but, after this bill is up, whenever he obtains the floor, he can move to lay it aside and bring up any other measure that he desires to consider. I do not propose to occupy the floor except when the bill is called up to have it read. I do not propose to make any speech upon it further than in explanation, and to give such information as I may be in possession of in regard to the manner of the adoption of the constitution, and answering such questions as may be asked by any member of the Senate in regard to it, as far as I can.

Mr. WILLEY. I am exceedingly anxious that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the Arkansas bill. I desire beyond measure that that question should be settled; that representation from the State of Arkansas should be admitted into both Houses; but I am very unwilling to sit here for a whole week and listen to any discussion that may ensue, not wholly with a view to enlighten the Senate on the subject before it, but to postpone any final action upon this bill, if it shall be taken up, until after the Senate, sitting as a court, shall meet on to-morrow week. If those who are opposed to the representation from the State of Arkansas would say to the Senate that they would not exercise the power, which they have the right to do, to bring about such a postponement, then I should know how to vote intelligently on this subject. It is perfectly within the power of those who are opposed to the admission of these States by discussing the matter for eight or ten days to postpone it beyond the period to which I have alluded and to detain the Senate upon this single subject, not with the view of discussing the question or obtaining light upon the matter actually in issue, but with a view of postponing it beyond a certain day, and in the meantime we shall have had an idle discussion amounting to nothing but a waste of time. I admit the right of those who are opposed to the admission of the representation of this State so to act; it is their perfect right; there can be no fault found with gentlemen if they do resort to it; but if I could know exactly whether they intend to do so I should know how to vote upon the subject actually before the Senate. I do desire that this question should be settled; certainly this State is entitled to it; but if the discussion is to amount to nothing for a week what is the use of entering upon it?

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, this is May, 1868. The war closed in April, 1865. The seceding States are still without any representation in this body or in the other, with the exception of Tennessee. The President, a short time after the suppression of the rebellion, undertook to reconstruct the southern States on his own plan. He organized governments during the summer of 1865, prescribing the qualifications of voters, fixing the qualifications of office-holders, &c. Those governments were presented to us in the winter of 1865, and we did not choose—and I voted with the majority—to admit their representatives. I thought that we did right. But the Senate ought to remember that we let the long session of 1865–66 pass away, having adjourned late in July, according to my recollection, without having passed any bill for reconstruction at all. We did nothing. In January, 1866, I offered an amendment to the Constitution here, in regard to which nothing was done, for the purpose of fixing a basis upon which reconstruction could be afterward had—an amendment declaring that suffrage for black and white should be upon equal terms throughout the United States. That was voted down, or rather was not acted on. A constitutional amendment was adopted, however, and it was to be submitted to all the States—an amendment called the fourteenth article. I voted for that ultimately, though I did not like it so well as my own; but that was submitted to all the States, including the Legislatures of the southern States set up by the President. We met here in the winter of 1866 and we passed no measure on the subject of reconstruction until March 2, 1867. Nearly two years had elapsed before we undertook any plan upon our own responsibility.

We have professed ourselves exceedingly anxious to have these States represented, but our objection has been to the plan of the President. This whole war since January, 1866, between the executive and legislative departments of the Government has been based upon this difference in regard to reconstruction. Congress has expressed a desire again and again to readmit these States the very moment that reconstruction was accomplished upon its plan. Now, sir, after the passage of a supplementary act about the 23d of March, 1867, and afterward one in July, for which we were called here specially, on account of an opinion of the Attorney General—

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I call the Senator to order. This is a motion to take up a bill, and I make the question of order that this general debate is entirely out of order on a motion to take up a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can prescribe no limitation to debate; but it is evident that debate on a motion to take up a bill ought to be confined to the question of taking it up, and should not extend to its merits at large.

Mr. FESSENDEN. General reasons may be assigned why a bill should or should not be taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The new rules expressly provide that on a motion to take up a bill debate on the merits of the question proposed to be considered is not in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not debating the merits of that question, but another one. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is still worse.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The new rules specially provide that debate on such a motion shall be confined to reasons for taking up or not taking up the measure proposed to be considered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely what the Senator from Missouri is doing. He is giving his reasons why the bill should be taken up.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; and the Senate will see that all I am saying is quite pertinent to the question under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will proceed. It is very difficult for the Chair to prescribe limits to debate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have to use more words than some people in order to express an idea. I was saying that Arkansas and the other States have been organized under the plan of Congress. After ninety days has been expended here upon an impeachment trial, and every time the court adjourns it is utterly impossible for us to do any business connected with legislation, if the Senate is to adjourn now for ten days what will be the result? I will not say that the ninety days spent upon the impeachment might have been better spent on other business; but I will say that perhaps that time might have been much better spent in the legislation that the country demands upon financial questions, upon commercial questions, and upon internal revenue questions. However, I make no complaint. The Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has, against my vote, adjourned until the 26th instant. That left us from the time of that adjournment about ten days for legislative business; and now we are approaching the heat of the summer, and it is coolly proposed to adjourn the Senate also. What for?

We were told here the other day that in Arkansas and the other southern States murders by the wholesale were being committed; that there was perfect anarchy, confusion, disorder, and that these States ought to be immediately admitted. These statements were somewhat surprising to me; but it is possible that Senators who made them will now consent to leave the public business of the country, and when the heats of summer are approaching run home or else go to their rooms and leave the business of the session undone? Has not this State been reconstructed upon the congressional plan? Have not equal rights been secured to the blacks in Arkansas? I understand so. I understand that this reorganization has been entirely in accordance with the acts of March 2 and March 23, 1867, and that the people of Arkansas have complied with every condition imposed by Congress, and that disorder, confusion, and wild anarchy exist there simply because their government is not recognized by Congress, and the Union people there demand immediate admission. And yet, Mr. President, are we to run away from our duty, neglect to discharge it, and adjourn? For what purpose? I suppose for some of our members to attend the Chicago convention.

Now, Mr. President, if Senators desire to go, I suppose that a quorum will remain here to attend to business, or if the members of the House desire to go I do not wish to put any obstacle in their way. I am perfectly willing to so vote as to enable the House to adjourn until that time. But where is the necessity of the Senate leaving? The Arkansas bill has been passed by the House, and it is here for our consideration. On next Tuesday, I suppose, we shall again be employed in the decision of the impeachment matter, and I cannot tell how long it will last. Perhaps we shall have another adjournment of it; perhaps new articles of impeachment will be presented, and we may again be detained perhaps for a month or longer. Are we to do no legislation at all? Are we to abandon the whole thing, and say that we cannot compose our minds to the duties incumbent upon us here as legislators, and that there is only one thing we can attend to, and that is impeachment?

Mr. President, if Senators desire to take that responsibility, I for one shall submit; but I have looked at the subject, and have concluded that it is our duty to remain. If members of the other House desire to go to Chicago or anywhere else—if they desire to visit their homes, or if Senators desire to go home in order to ascertain the feeling of their constituents on the subject of impeachment, or on the subject even of the admission of these States, I am perfectly willing that they shall do so; but certainly a quorum will remain to discuss this Arkansas matter and the introduction of the other States. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has a bill for the admission of six other of these States. Is it possible that we shall shrink from our duty, that we shall run away and leave it undone? When are we to act on this subject? Can we satisfy the people who are so often appealed to in this Chamber, now that these States are reorganized and reconstructed upon the plan which we ourselves imposed upon them; can we satisfy the people that we are doing our duty, when they ask for admission and we ourselves say that disorder and confusion exist because they are not represented, by going away and leaving this business unattended to? I think not. Mr. President, let these gentlemen take the responsibility of adjournment; I shall vote against it.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I desire to make simply one remark suggested by what has just fallen from the Senator from Missouri. He says that disorder and confusion exist in these States because we do not act.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I stated no such thing.

Mr. SUMNER. What was it?

Mr. HENDERSON. I stated that Senators here had said on Saturday that disorder and confusion did exist there because they were not in the Union.

Mr. SUMNER. Because they were not in the Union. The whole reason why there is disorder there, and why there is bloodshed and a menace of bloodshed, is because Andrew Johnson is now President of the United States. That is the reason; none other.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I would ask whether the motion of the Senator from Illinois has been reduced to writing. If it has been I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no motion except to take up a bill for consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is never reduced to writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule requiring that to be in writing.

Mr. DRAKE. I understood that the Chair decided that it was not in order to amend that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did decide that the two motions were independent of each other, and that the first moved was to be first put.

Mr. DRAKE. Then, sir, let us take the vote. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the roll-call must commence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Tipton, Trumbull, Wiley, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Howe, McCreery, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Williams, and Yates—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Frothingham, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, and Thayer—14.

So the motion of Mr. TRUMBULL was not agreed to.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED COTTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 27th of January last, information in relation to sales of captured and abandoned cotton.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that is in response to a resolution which was offered by me some time ago inquiring when the money was covered into the Treasury that was received from captured and abandoned property. I move that the communication lie on the table, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 473) for the relief of Charles E. Capehart;

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868;

A bill (H. R. No. 1062) to grant the right of way to the Plattsburg and Whitehall Railroad Company; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) concerning certain lands granted to railroad companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution requesting of the Senate a certified copy of the proceedings of the last two days of the trial of the impeachment of the President of the United States.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. DRAKE. I move now that the Senate take up the concurrent resolution returned to the Senate by the House of Representatives this morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I move now that the Senate reconsider the vote on the resolution taken last Saturday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if he voted with the majority before?

Mr. DRAKE. I voted with the majority. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That at the adjournment on Saturday, the 16th instant, a recess be taken until Monday, the 25th instant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Howe, Johnson, McCrery, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, and Williams—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Morgan, Morton, Ross, Sherman, Tipton, Trumbull, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Thayer—11.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DRAKE. I move now to amend the resolution by striking out the words "on Saturday, the 16th instant," and inserting "of the two Houses this day;" so as to make the resolution read:

That at the adjournment of the two Houses this day a recess be taken until Monday, the 25th instant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution, as amended.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. As it is now too late to go to the Chicago convention if the adjournment takes place, I would like to know the reason for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution, as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as I voted the other day in favor of continuing the session of the Senate through this week, and made a speech which everybody who heard me is bound by, according to the rules of law as administered here, who did not dissent on the spot, I wish to state my reasons for voting the other way now, and to give notice that everybody will be bound by these reasons on the same principle unless they dissent forthwith. [Laughter.]

I did believe, Mr. President, the other day that we should succeed in accomplishing business in the regular, methodical way this week. I am satisfied from my observation since that I was in error; and like other brave and conscientious men, when I see that I have made a mistake I am willing to correct it. I see that everybody is tired and indisposed to give that attention and devotion to business which usually characterize this body; and I believe, therefore, that an adjournment over for one week at this time will be a useful thing. It is quite evident to me that the notion of our going home early this season may as well be abandoned now as at any other time. It will be quite probable that there are public reasons, good public reasons—if it will not be considered as reflecting on anybody I will say public considerations—which should induce us to attend to the interests of our constituents here. And in that view I am disposed to reconsider my determination of last week and to take my resting spell now. These are my reasons.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, as I voted against this resolution when it was here last Saturday and have moved its reconsideration to-day, I feel justified in a brief statement of the reason why I have done so.

I am equally satisfied with the honorable Senator from Vermont that it is hardly worth while to attempt to transact public business at this particular juncture of time. Two or three times this morning there has been a call of the other House, with great difficulty to keep a quorum there; and I do not believe it can be kept there; and we in the Senate have been sitting here as we never sat before since I have known anything of the history of the Senate, except at the close of the session. Day after day for two months we have been wearing down the system completely by close confinement. A number of Senators have gone away; a number of others wish to go away; some are so far indisposed that they feel it a necessity that they should leave; and why should we punish ourselves by staying here to transact business with the Senate in that condition and with the other House in the condition that I have depicted? These are my reasons for the course which I have taken about this matter.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Howe, Johnson, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Cragin, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Morgan, Morton, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, McCrery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Thayer—12.

So the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I hope my friend from Illinois will move now to take up the Arkansas bill.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, there is a resolution on the table from the House that seems to me ought to be acted upon in relation to a certified copy of a record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution of the House of Representatives:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 13, 1868.

Resolved, That the Senate are hereby requested to direct that a certified copy of the proceedings for the last two days of the trial of the impeachment of the President of the United States be sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I move that a certified copy of the proceedings mentioned in that order of the House of Representatives be sent to the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the proceedings I suppose are furnished to the other House regularly; they are laid on the desk of each member. Is there anything accompanying that resolution; any reason given for their desiring to have a certified copy? I only want to know the fact?

Mr. POMEROY. No reason is given. They only ask for a certified copy.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let them have it; I have no objection to their having it; but I cannot imagine why they want it.

Mr. SUMNER. There can be no conceivable objection to it if the House ask for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was going to say that I have no objection to their having it; but it is rather a singular request.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I observe by the official proceedings of the other branch of Congress that they are not overburdened with business as was supposed. They have an abundant leisure not only for taking care of those interests which are committed to them by the Constitution and for protecting the dignity and honor of their own House, but also for extending their action and taking in charge business and interests which pertain to the Senate; and they have openly, in the face of the nation, authorized a certain number of their members to investigate questions which have relation to the transactions and to the character of the Senate of the United States. They propose to enter upon an investigation of the influences, as I think the resolution expresses it, which have been exerted and have operated upon the members of the Senate sitting in their judicial capacity as a court of impeachment. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that if the House of Representatives, a coördinate branch of the legislative department with us, or any of its members, have information which affects the character of Senators or the integrity of those proceedings in which the Senate has been engaged, it is their business to communicate that information to the Senate in order that it may take such action as in its judgment pertains to its dignity, to its character, and to the transaction of its business; and I take it for granted that if such information were conveyed, this Senate has yet enough of vigor and of brain to meet and to discharge all the duties which would become obligatory upon it in consequence of such information.

I understand that when this Senate is charged by the Constitution with a duty, and is proceeding to perform that duty, it has all the authority and power requisite to take charge of, to take care of all collateral questions connected with its jurisdiction. I understand that the House have now sent us a resolution asking an official transcript of the record of what the Senate has done, not for the mere purpose of informing that body, because it was present during all our open proceedings, and it has official published copies of all that was done when we were in private session, but I infer for the purpose of having this body recognize by a deliberate vote the proceedings upon which they have entered. What business has the House with the records of this Senate in connection with any such volunteer proceeding as that upon which some committee or some number of their members is about to enter?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order; and that is, that the Senator from Pennsylvania has no right to refer to any proceeding of any committee of the House whatever.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a new idea.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a new idea.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Sir, I shall await the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule about referring to the House, and let us see what it is.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"No person is to use indecent language against the proceedings of the House; no prior determination of which is to be reflected on by any member, unless he means to conclude with a motion to rescind it. But while a proposition under consideration is still in fieri, though it has even been reported by a committee, reflections on it are no reflections on the House."—Barclay's Manual, page 74.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the rule to which I referred. It is in Jefferson's Manual and relates to the proceedings of the two Houses, that it is contrary to parliamentary propriety for a member of either House to comment upon the proceedings of the other; not that House. That which the Clerk has read relates to the proceedings of our own body only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another rule which the Clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there, because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independence, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses."—Barclay's Manual, page 77.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What words of the Senator from Pennsylvania does the Senator from Vermont think exceptionable?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have nearly forgotten the words it is so long ago; but what the Senator was proceeding to do was to allude to the proceedings of the House of Representatives by one of its committees in inquiring into certain matters which he was commenting upon. That, as it appears to me, is a plain breach of the rule which has been read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire where that rule leads to? According to that the House might do anything or everything with reference to this body, pass any resolution that it chose, and send that to us, and in discussing that resolution we could not speak of the proceedings in the other body. That is the proposition of the honorable Senator from Vermont in plain terms. Nothing has been said disrespectful of that body. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania was proceeding simply to discuss the question of what this was probably wanted for, what the object was; and speaking of that object and that purpose it is very singular that in a matter of an application to us nobody here can speak of what has been done in the other House at any time with the matter under consideration. I submit that the rule has no application to the question raised by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it would be a breach of order to say anything that would cause misunderstanding or any contention between the two bodies. I suppose that would not be proper; but really the rule is only where the House have made use of certain language, it seems, or where the votes have been censured, or something of that kind. I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania was out of order as far as he had gone; and so the objection is overruled. The Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I was nearly through with my observations. The House of Representatives have not informed us, on the face of their resolution nor by a message, of any object for which they desire the copy of our record; and the only supposition which can reasonably be made upon what we know, is that this information is required for the purpose of investigating the Senate of the United States or "the influences," as I believe the resolution expresses it, to which this Senate has been subjected. They have the official report which is published in the Globe and laid upon our tables daily, the publication of which is paid for out of the public moneys.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, in order to get the precise language of the resolution, I will read it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will give way for that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will read the preamble.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the date?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is the Globe laid on our tables to-day. It is in Saturday's proceedings in the House of Representatives:

"Be it resolved, That for the further and more efficient prosecution of the impeachment of the President the managers be directed and instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint sub-committees to take testimony, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I rise not because the resolution of this House touches me in the remotest particular or awakens any feelings in my mind other than those of regret that the House should have gone beyond what I think is its appropriate jurisdiction, and have encroached upon what I cannot but think to be a prerogative of the Senate, and that is to vindicate itself and its own proceedings, if it thinks proper, from any imputation which would affect them injuriously with the public. I rise to object to the consent proposed that these proceedings may be transmitted to the House in the interests of the body and of no particular member of it, myself or any other one. If we are to sit quietly by and allow everything to take place which may be inspired by temporary hostility or by temporary excitement with regard to the Senate and to its proceedings, we shall justly incur public reprobation; we shall fall below the standard which we ought to maintain for ourselves; we shall lower the dignity of this branch of Congress, and we shall have no right hereafter to object to any impertinence or to any insult which may be directed against the Senate by a member of the House of Representatives, or by some inadvertent, thoughtless, passionate, or excited action of the House.

I insist that if there be any cause for an investigation of this description the information should be laid before the Senate itself, and it should act, and that we ought to resent or at least to oppose a transfer of our just authority and powers in reference to questions of this kind to the House of Representatives, or to the President, or to the courts, or to any other power upon earth. We are competent to vindicate ourselves; we are competent to preserve pure and unsullied the course of public justice so far as we are concerned in it, and for one I am disposed to uphold the dignity and rights of the Senate. For this object alone have I spoken.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania proceed on a singular theory; nothing less than this, that by this inquiry the Senate is assailed. What reason is there to believe that the House have any such purpose in the inquiry? Nothing but the imagination of the Senator; nothing in the text of the resolution; and if you look still further at the debate—and after the allusion that has been made to the resolution I shall be justified in calling attention to it—if you look at the very statement of Mr. BINGHAM, the chairman of the committee of managers, you will find that he stated that it was—

"To see whether the rightful power of this House to prosecute impeachment is attempted, wrongfully and corruptly, to be interfered with and controlled by anybody, either by the President or by the President's hired agents!"

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that in the resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. That is the speech of Mr. BINGHAM sustaining the resolution, and I take it that is the reason of the resolution; it is to ascertain whether or not on the part of the President, the respondent at your bar, or any agents representing him, there has been an attempt which justifies the inquiry of the House.

Now, sir, I have no knowledge of these proceedings beyond what appears in the report; nothing at all; I have heard nobody speak of it; but looking at the report it seems to me that it is a proceeding with which the Senate cannot in any way interfere.

Are we not now engaged in trying the President of the United States on articles of impeachment, and do not those articles conclude with a statement that the House of Representatives reserves to itself at all times hereafter the right to exhibit further articles of impeachment? Suppose, now, the House have found that the President, or agents of the President, have been engaged in an attempt of a corrupt character, would they not be justified in making an inquiry into the character of that attempt? Would the Senate venture at this stage to throw itself in the path of that inquiry? We know from the evidence before us something of the character of the President of the United States; we know how utterly unprincipled and wicked he is; it is in evidence. We also know what some of his agents and representatives, or those who speak in his defense, not, of course, in this Chamber, have openly said. I have in my hands a brief extract from the New York World, a paper which I understand has throughout this trial sustained the President day by day, insisting that he was not guilty of those articles on which he has been arraigned. What does this paper say; a paper sustaining the cause of the President? I quote it as a part of history and as showing the character of some of the President's defenders. It is as follows.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I desire to ask if it is editorial.

Mr. SUMNER. Editorial.

Mr. DIXON. Is it editorial?

Mr. SUMNER. I understand so.

Mr. DIXON. I say it is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (to Mr. Dixon.) You do not know what he is going to read yet.

Mr. SUMNER. It is from the New York World:

"There are fourteen Radical Senators whose terms of office expire in 1869. Beyond that time they are sure of no political position; so far as they know now they are certain of no 'paying place.' Surely as many as eight of these men would far rather be sure of a million each in hand than to wait for the uncertainty of a $5,000 office by and by. Let us buy their votes at their own price."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. Excuse me; I shall be done in a moment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I want to put you right on that point.

Mr. SUMNER. These are words proceeding from a defender of the President. Are they not calculated to arouse the inquiry on the part of the House?

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Wait one moment. Especially if the committee of the House are able to say, as they do in the resolution, that they report that "information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe"—mark!—"probable cause to believe that improper and corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States." Now, on that suggestion of the House I have nothing to say. I await the result of the inquiry; but I insist that the Senate at this stage cannot interpose itself in the path of that inquiry. Whichever way it may end, whether by the further impeachment of the President of the United States or in any other direction, let the inquiry proceed.

Mr. CONNESS obtained the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts one question, and that is whether he is one of the fourteen whose terms expire in 1869?

Mr. SUMNER. I am.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He has not seen anything of the million, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. I did not vote "not guilty."

Mr. FESSENDEN. But there are several articles left yet to vote on. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. I would say, however, to the Senator from Maine that I am not afraid of investigation; I welcome it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose nobody else here is afraid of it.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. I have given my reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will say to the Senator from California that I rose to make an explanation during the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, and he requested me to wait until he was done. I want to make a reply by way of explanation to his reference to what he read from the New York World.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California give way for the explanation?

Mr. CONNESS. Not at this time; the Senator from Pennsylvania will excuse me. I will just say in passing, in regard to what I did give way for, that it is entirely possible that those persons discovered that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts could not be purchased for less than a million and a quarter or a million and a half, [laughter,] and the fund would not hold out.

Mr. President, I rose to say that I regret very deeply that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, for whom I have a profound respect, and for whose judgment I have an admiration, should have introduced this topic or given the debate the turn it has taken in connection with the resolution before us; and I regret still further that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts should have seen fit to proceed in the same direction, and then to read for us what I will characterize as a villainous article from one of the public papers of the country.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me a moment, by way of explanation, to put a single question to himself, and that is whether he knows that this article is a communication and not an editorial?

Mr. CONNESS. I neither know nor care.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the Senator whether he does not know, also, that the editor stated that it was intended to be ironical?

Mr. CONNESS. I neither know nor care.

Mr. DIXON. He ought to have added that statement of the editor.

Mr. CONNESS. I reply again that I neither know nor care. I rose to suggest that the resolution before us, and action upon it, has no necessary or legitimate connection with the proceedings of the House of Representatives that have been read from the Globe. The House does not state in its resolution, which simply asks for a copy of certain of our proceedings, for what it requires them or wants them. It was not called on to do so. When we send to the House for a bill which has left our custody and got into theirs we never state why we send for it. Our requests and requests of the House of this character are never refused. They are based upon not a right, but a comity that amounts to a right, and it is always obeyed. I care nothing about the investigation going on; I care much less about the newspaper article that has been read. I have lived long enough in public life to know that every public man, no matter how pure he may be, is regarded by not a very virtuous part of the community or society in which he lives as a target for abuse. I would not dignify the article referred to by its introduction here.

But I rose, Mr. President, to say that I regretted the direction the debate had taken; that I cannot see how we can refuse, no matter for what purpose the House requires it, (and it is not for us to inquire,) a certified copy of certain of our proceedings. If they should, in the progress of any investigation that they propose making, trench upon the prerogative of the Senate, I should be as ready as any Senator here to resent and resist such an encroachment. But we are not to assume that they want it for any purpose of that kind. Nor will I discuss the question whether, under the constitutional power of the House to impeach, and while an impeachment is pending, they have a right to inquire in the direction they have proposed to inquire or not. I think all we have to do is simply to respond to the House by giving them a copy of the record called for.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I agree fully with the Senator from California. I think we ought to give them anything they ask, for I would not stand upon ceremony; I would welcome any investigation. I think this is—but perhaps I had better not characterize it, and I will not; but, at any rate, whatever that body ask for I shall vote to give them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from California that this is a question of courtesy or comity between the two Houses; but the resolution under which the other House are acting is a resolution which in its very terms, it seems to me, speaks of the Senate in language that forbids us to look upon this question as one of mere comity. In the resolution under which they claim to act they assert that "information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment." There is an allegation that corrupt means have been used. What is the meaning of these words?

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend permit me a single word?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. It is only to say that I do not see the necessary connection between the request they make here and that proceeding. There is none stated. I hope the Senator will agree with me in this.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Since the House have passed a resolution in which they assert that they have information which seems to them to furnish probable cause for believing that corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate, I think that it requires us, the Senate of the United States, to ask the House of Representatives to furnish us the information upon which they are proceeding to act, and not call upon us for testimony or what may be used by them as testimony; for they ask a certified copy of our proceedings, which could only be used as evidence to be introduced in court or before some committee. As they have made that allegation in the resolution which they have adopted, it seems to me it is not a mere question of comity, and therefore I think there is great force in the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I cannot take my seat without making a single remark in reply to what has fallen from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I know that the honorable Senator, whenever he speaks upon this question, speaks with a great advantage over me and over many other members of the Senate, for he feels himself entirely at liberty in his place as a Senator to speak of the President of the United States, although this impeachment is still pending undetermined in the court, in the most unmeasured terms of denunciation; and others who are here sitting in this court of impeachment feel constrained not to speak, not even to open their mouths, upon the questions which are involved in the impeachment so long as that case is pending here. I therefore feel constrained even now to keep my mouth closed from entering into anything like a defense of the President as connected with anything involved in the impeachment trial.

But aside from that, and outside of the impeachment trial or anything contained in the articles, upon which I am not at liberty to speak, and shall therefore say nothing, I say to that honorable Senator that he never in his life has done more injustice to a human being than he has done in standing here and speaking of Mr. Johnson as unprincipled and a wicked man. He may have his mistakes; he may err in judgment; but I say to that honorable Senator from perhaps an acquaintance more familiar with the President than he has had during the last three years, a constant acquaintance with him, that, if I am any judge of a man when put in high place, or in any trying position, as to the integrity of the motives by which he is governed, I never in my life have met a more honest man than Andrew Johnson. And I say to that honorable Senator that although he may make great mistakes, and I confess that he has; although he may err in judgment, as no doubt he has; although he may err in matters of taste, in matters of rhetoric, he may err in making public speeches and extempore speeches, (which, in my judgment, no President should ever make at all,) still, when we come to the question of the integrity of his motives—I speak not now of any matter which is involved in this prosecution, because there are distinct charges and articles brought against him, and I speak not upon that subject; but outside of that, I say, Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, that I believe him to be an upright and an honest man. His whole life has demonstrated it. I know he has not had the advantages of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts; neither of learning, nor of education, nor of opportunity; but, sir, he has that which neither wealth can bestow nor universities of learning confer; he has that which belongs to those who come into this world, whether in a palace or in a manger, with their souls lighted with celestial fire, with nature's stamp as one of God's nobility, an honest man.

And, sir, I have another thing to say to the Senator from Massachusetts, that upon him personally more than upon any other man rests this very controversy between the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States which for the last three years has agitated the country. Was it not the Senator from Massachusetts, in his place here, who, before any controversy had ever begun, rose in his place, when the President of the United States sent in a message, with a report of General Grant accompanying it, and denounced it as a whitewashing message? He was the one that made the attack. He began that warfare which led to this breach; and from that day to the present moment he has never let slip an occasion to denounce Mr. Johnson whenever he could get an opportunity.

Mr. President, I do not refer to newspaper reports with any great degree of reliance; I know how much they are liable to be misled; but information came to me the other day since the vote which occurred in the impeachment trial, stating that a certain Methodist conference, I think, or some Christian denomination, assembled in Chicago, receiving information that there had been some corrupt practices in the Senate of the United States, resolved to hold a day of fasting and prayer upon the subject of the corruption of Senators, or words to that effect. To us, who know the men with whom we are associated; to us, who know the honorable Senators here who have been denounced for separating from their political associates in the votes they have given, this is of no consequence; it would only excite a smile of derision to talk about the use of money and corruption in reference to the votes which have been given by Senators in this body. We know the men who are here. But at a great distance, a thousand miles away, all may not know them; and when the House of Representatives pass a resolution which seems to say that they have information going to show probable cause to believe that corrupt means have been used in the Senate, I think, Mr. President and Senators, it is a question for the Senate to enter upon; it is for the Senate and not for the House of Representatives; and therefore I think that great force should be given to the observations of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and as this evidence is called for in pursuance of that resolution of the House, I think the Senate should hesitate before yielding what would be yielded as a matter of comity under ordinary circumstances until we can have some explanation from the House in relation to the resolution which has been passed by that body.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I cannot view this subject in the light in which the Senator from Wisconsin views it. I cannot for the life of me see that there is any reflection upon the Senate in the action of the House of Representatives; and even if there was a reflection upon the Senate, I cannot see that the Senate should refuse any investigation which may be suggested by the House.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask my honorable friend if he proposes to have the Senate investigated by the House?

Mr. YATES. I will answer the Senator's question. I propose that the Senate of the United States shall defy investigation from any source or quarter, and if the Senator from Wisconsin is afraid of investigation, I am not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not afraid of investigation; but I would not submit for one, as a Senator, to have the Senate investigated by the House. We might just as well investigate the House.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, if the Senator had waited until I had made my introductory remarks, at least he would have seen upon what ground I based the first sentence I uttered.

The House of Representatives is a party to this impeachment proceeding. By the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives is prosecutor in the case. The people of the United States, through the House of Representatives, have laid the indictment before us; and if the House of Representatives or any member of that House is satisfied that there is probable cause to suppose that money, that bribery, that corruption in any shape or form, has been used to influence the deliberations of the Senate, that House or that member of the House would be derelict in his duty and a disgrace to the country in which he lived if he did not introduce a resolution of inquiry on the part of the House as prosecutor in the case.

Will the honorable Senator from Wisconsin pretend to say that when attorneys designated by law to prosecute in the case, the prosecuting attorneys, the people's attorneys, have heard of the use of corrupt and illegal means by which to influence the verdict in the trial of a cause of great importance, affecting the interests of the people deeply and broadly, it is not their duty to bring the question to an investigation?

Mr. President, I say that the Senate should demand that this investigation proceed. I, as a Senator, wish to vindicate that purity to which the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has so beautifully and so eloquently referred; but, sir, you cannot do it by obstructing investigation; you cannot do it, as the Senator from Wisconsin would do it, by saying that the House of Representatives is severely reflecting upon the Senate.

I do not propose to follow the Senator from Wisconsin in his defense of Andrew Johnson, or in his response to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts; but if I were the defender and apologist of Andrew Johnson, I would not attempt to smother investigation; I would not reflect upon the coordinate branch of this Congress because they propose to investigate these charges. The air is full of rumors; the public press and the minds of the people are alive with the charges that have been made, whether true or false—and, sir, I am not here to say that they are true; I am not here to say that the palm of any man's hand has been soiled with the thirty pieces of silver; I am not here to say that any political ambition, any desire for office, or any hope of future rewards has influenced the vote of a single individual. But I say the atmosphere around us and all over the country is rife with charges and rumors of this kind, and I desire an investigation to vindicate the purity of the Senate; that every Senator may feel that he is free and exculpated from these charges so detrimental to his honor and to the standing of the Senate. In this view I can see no impropriety whatever in the action which has been taken by the House of Representatives, and I would say that instead of opposing investigation the Senate should do everything which it can to encourage investigation.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have precisely the same opinion of the proceedings of the House of Representatives, and of the charges implied or directly brought in the resolution of the House which has been submitted to us, that has been expressed by my friend from Wisconsin. I consider the charges as base and as baseless as he does; but I think a more proper mode of investigation would be by the Senate. I think it might be proper, and perhaps it would be proper, for the Senate to ask the House to furnish this body with the testimony before them for the purpose of enabling us to proceed with an investigation, if an investigation is necessary, and I do not know but that such a resolution ought to accompany our compliance with their request. But still, sir, I am of opinion, when I consider what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] has said, that the air is full, and has been for six weeks full, not only of charges against this body but of menaces and threats, that we ought to lay aside all questions of dignity, and we ought to say to the House and to everybody else: "We are perfectly willing to furnish anything that you may ask for which will enable you to substantiate your charges, if you have any charge to make."

That is my opinion, and I am sorry to differ with my friend from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania. I believe that if we should take any other ground it might be made use of; it might be said that we feared investigation. For myself I utterly condemn and despise this charge. I know these Senators about me too well. Why, sir, the idea deserves nothing but utter contempt that there is a Senator in this body who could be influenced in the manner intimated by the House of Representatives. You, sir, know well, and I know well, that there is not a man in the Senate who could be approached in the manner which has been intimated. But, sir, it is rather late for this body to put itself on its dignity after what we have submitted to. Here, in this very Hall, one of the managers of impeachment, on the part of the House of Representatives, dared to tell this Senate that the Senate dared not acquit the accused President. One of these managers dared to say that everlasting obloquy would pursue any Senator who voted to acquit. He said the same before in the House. What else have you submitted to? Your own Secretary day after day has heaped calumny and insult upon this body, and you have permitted it. And now, sir, my friend from Wisconsin will excuse me for saying that it is too late for this body to stand upon its dignity. We have been insulted; we have been brow-beaten; we have allowed the press of this country—no, sir; I will not use the epithet which I was about to employ—we have allowed this trial to be taken out of our hands. We have allowed editors to come here upon this floor to indite their insulting epistles. We have given seats—an honor which I could not get for the Governor of Connecticut—upon this floor to editors of newspapers who have written to their papers letters insulting to the Senate and attempting to influence the action of the Senate. Now, I say, it is too late to stand upon our dignity. If anybody wishes to accuse Senators here of receiving bribes, furnish all the evidence he may ask for; I would give him our proceedings; I would give him all the papers, and let him do his worst.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator give way to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. HARLAN. I think this resolution ought to be acted upon. I have but one or two observations to make. I agree fully with the Senator from California that there is no apparent connection between the request made by the House of Representatives and what Senators suppose may be the purpose of the House in asking for this certified record. But, sir, if the two are to be taken together, I do not think that they imply any censure or reflection upon any Senator. The resolution, if I heard it read correctly by the Senator from Wisconsin, states that they have reason to believe that corrupt means have been attempted to influence the Senate, and they deem it to be their duty to look into it. Doubtless, if in the progress of that inquiry the House should ascertain that any Senator was improperly implicated, they would notify the Senate of that fact, just as the Senate had done heretofore when a member of the House had been supposed to be guilty of an impropriety in relation to a member of the Senate. Since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor I remember that it was alleged that a member of the House had made an assault on a member of the Senate. The matter was investigated by a committee of this body; the facts were ascertained, showing that, in the opinion of the Senate, this member of the House was implicated in an improper act. The House was notified, and appointed a committee to investigate the matter, and the House inflicted a certain punishment.

Now, the House say that they have reason to believe that improper means have been used to influence the conduct of the Senate. No one, surely, will pretend that the House is not a competent tribunal to investigate the conduct of civil officers of the Government, for the Constitution has conferred on that body the right to arraign civil officers of the Government before the Senate. Their inquiry may be in relation to civil officers of the Government, and I think they name one in their resolution. If, therefore, they should find that officers of this Government have been attempting to use improper or corrupt means to influence the decision of this body, it may be ground of impeachment of that officer, and they may, therefore, with great propriety proceed to investigate it without reference to any connection it may have with members of this body. But, as before remarked, if they should ascertain that some member of this body may have been improperly connected with any such transaction, it will be then time for members of the Senate to complain of a discourtesy on the part of the House if the House should proceed to attempt to inflict punishment on that member of the Senate. Then, doubtless, they would report the facts to the Senate and the Senate would proceed to vindicate its own honor.

Taking, therefore, the past history of the two bodies as this history has come to my knowledge, I can see no necessary reflection on a member of the Senate in the course pursued by the House if this request of theirs must necessarily be connected with the resolution to which reference has been made; but I see personally no necessary connection between the two, and I hope that before an adjournment shall be had the Senate will grant this courtesy to the House and give them a certified copy of our proceedings as they request. I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

[A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had laid on the table the concurrent resolution providing for a recess, and had also laid on the table a motion to reconsider the same.]

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the resolution before us seems to me to present a novel and somewhat complex question—the question whether in any case or for any reason it pertains to the House of Representatives to investigate a matter concerning the conduct of this body or any member of it. I do not agree at all with the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] that there is the slightest doubt of the connection between this order lying upon the table and that resolution which has been read as adopted by the House. It seems to me there is no doubt that this resolution before us is a continuance of that proceeding inaugurated by the resolution which was read by the honorable Senator from Iowa.

Yet I think he answers fairly the objection which arises at this point, by saying that we are bound to suppose, if it is necessary to suppose in order to acquit the House of any blame, that the aim of this investigation is to lay the information in the end, should it be gained, before the Senate for its action. That answer alone, perhaps, is sufficient to any criticism which might here arise. Nevertheless, the general question seems to me to remain, how it is that the House of Representatives gets possession, gets jurisdiction of a question like this; and if that jurisdiction can be found at all, I think it must be found in the direction pointed out by the honorable Senator from Illinois. Embracery of the jury is a term and an offense not unknown to the common law; and the mode of dealing with that offense is not unknown to the usages of the common law. Therefore, perhaps, all Senators who are willing to take this view of the subject may for the time being content themselves, as my honorable friend from Connecticut is able to content himself, and other Senators have declared they are content, to allow this investigation to proceed.

But, sir, there is another view of the subject which has rested for several days in my mind, and which addresses itself to me now as the graver and the more interesting consideration connected with it. The land rings with accusations, with imputations upon Senators named and unnamed, grave and polluting in their character. I shall be glad to see some investigation, any investigation, I care not what, for this purpose, which will give to every man entitled to it, every man to whom it is important, his day in court to show cause for these statements, scandalizing as they do not only the Senate and the country, but the age I might almost say; and whenever the time shall come as a period in this proceeding now carried on by the House, or as a mere day or hour in the experience of this body, it will, I think, behoove us to consider what, looking to the fitness of things and looking to the privileges of the Senate, its Constitution, and its obligations, it befits us to do in regard to persons, if there shall turn out to be such, who, without its being founded on fact, without the existence of probable cause, or of any other thing in morals, in ethics, or in decency defending or extenuating the engendering and putting afloat of such accusations, has been bold enough to do it?

Sir, the annals of this body go back, not in the twilight of fable, or even of remote antiquity either, to times when the Senate reached out its arm to a distant city and brought here the correspondent of a newspaper who had soiled the name and the reputation of the Senate, and punished him with degradation and severity for what he had done. I say, without dilating upon it, that the question may be an interesting one when the time comes that it is in order; what it will belong to the Senate to do to those who have darkened the whole air about us with accusations which, if they be founded upon fact or upon probable cause, will, upon the demonstration of the foundation upon which they stand, be able to vindicate themselves against all comers, but accusations which, if they turn out to be the product of the heat, the licentiousness, the lawlessness of this time, will call, I think, loudly upon somebody to see to it that such steps are taken as it is proper to take to teach to all the world that even though a man be a member of one or the other House of Congress he is not thereby consigned to a position which entitles every one to shovel upon him all the filth which his inclination may lead him to fling.

This is no new matter, sir; and I speak of it, perhaps, with a feeling which does not come entirely from this time or this occasion. I have been present in the other House of Congress when, from motives such as I have alluded to and which I do not of course affirm have prevailed in this instance or appeared at all in this case, when from motives of a malicious character, men speaking from the outside of the Chamber have seized upon some occasion, some period of excitement, some streak of venomous feeling which happened to be afloat at the time, to strike at a particular man or particular men, and attempt to affix to them some stigma which should last, and that in punishment, in resentment for something, or to carry some collateral and distinct end. I do not mean to say at all, let me repeat, that I have any reason to suppose that to be true in this case; but I say as one of the alternatives here that if it shall turn out that in some or all instances this enormous flood of imputation which has gone out has had its origin in that sort of recklessness which is to be imputed to every man who, without knowledge of the truth of it, has declared it in newspapers or otherwise, it will present a proposition of much more interest to me than the particular question upon which this debate has arisen.

If there be any doubt of the jurisdiction of the House in this case, I think it concerns the practical profit of the occasion at least that that doubt should be resolved in favor of the House, that we should interpose nothing technical or otherwise until, as the Senator from Iowa suggested, some proposition shall be made that shows clearly an intention to attempt an infraction of the privileges of this body. I content myself with that for the present; but I say again that if in the progress of this investigation the time shall come when we shall see that these allegations have originated not in fact, not in a disposition honestly to pursue the truth, but on the sort of disposition which has heretofore exposed members of both Houses to this species of attack and aspersion, then I shall hold myself at liberty, waiving nothing here, to do as an original question what I think will pertain to the dignity of this body if it is able to lay its hands upon the man or the men guilty of the offending.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator will give way I will move an adjournment; it is now five o'clock.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, I will make only a few remarks on this extraordinary proceeding.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Pennsylvania wishes the floor for a moment to make an explanation, as I understand. I give way to him to make an explanation.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I have delayed some time making the explanation I promised when the Senator from Massachusetts was upon the floor. The extract which he read from the New York World is part of a communication from a correspondent, as has been a number of times stated since; that communication was drawn and was published with a special object; it was to expose the character of the arguments which had prevailed in a rival newspaper in regard to the proceeding of impeachment in the Senate. That rival newspaper had insisted that the trial of impeachment was not so much a judicial as a political question, and that Senators should take into account political interests and their own interests in the future. Ironically a correspondent publishes an article suggesting that a certain amount, $1,000,000 apiece, should be raised for a certain number of members of the Senate. The trap laid for the rival newspaper was successful; it at once denounced that proposition as perfectly outrageous; and then the World, which had published this communication, "came back" upon it in return, and it said, "You perceive now the outrageous character of your proposition that Senators should vote with reference to political considerations and their own personal interests as members of a party. You perceive that that is precisely of a class with a proposition to bribe members of the Senate." This has been so fully explained in the World, in which the communication appeared, that I think it strange it should have escaped the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts. I make this explanation as he has repeated it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. SPRAGUE. If the Senator will give way I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will withdraw it that we may adjourn over to Thursday.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 11, noes 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator from Kentucky has no objection I will move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. WILLEY. I hope not.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that question being put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. WILLEY. I hope not. I trust we shall not adjourn over. It does seem to me that this is trifling with the public business. We declined to adjourn over so as to give members time to go home to see their families. Now, sir, there is a great deal of business upon the docket besides the bill for the admission of Arkansas, which the Senate seems to be opposed to pressing for action now.

Why should we adjourn over from day to day at this period of the year, when we have so much business pressing upon us for action—private bills, public bills, appropriation bills, bills demanding action; bills upon which the country demands action? Why shall we, for side purposes, by this kind of indirection, shirk the responsibilities resting upon us as Senators? Let us take up the business of the country, and discharge our duty here as we ought to do. I do not know whether the other House will tomorrow reconsider its vote laying the resolution which went over to them upon the table. I understand that it cannot be done. There is no necessity, then, it seems to me—

Mr. HOWE. I rise to inquire whether this debate is in order. I understand there is no quorum here. We are debating another question, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion was made by the Senator from Massachusetts, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. HOWE. But the division just before had shown that there was not a quorum, as I understood the Chair to say.

Mr. WILLEY. If there is no quorum I have nothing more to say.

Mr. DRAKE. There is a quorum present now.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to know whether there is or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the Chair ascertain by a count.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suggest that the point must be made at the time. We have gone on with other business and it is to be presumed that we have a quorum.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know but that the presumption will overcome the record. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. Let us vote on the resolution that is before us, and then adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. According to the vote there was no quorum.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on the resolution before us. That will demonstrate whether there is a quorum.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is on the adjournment over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But that motion cannot be entertained without a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I take it the yeas and nays are ordered on the motion to adjourn, are they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion before the Senate on which the yeas and nays have been ordered is the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 16, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conness, Davis, Doollittle, Drake, Edmunds, Howe, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Cragin, Harlan, Henderson, McCreery, Morgan, Norton, Pomeroy, Ross, Sprague, Tipton, Trumbull, Willey, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Corbett, Dixon, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Sherman, Thayer, Vickers, and Williams—23.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. There are a good many speeches to be made on this matter, and I think time will be saved by an adjournment. I may want to make a speech myself. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not until we vote on this subject.

The Senate refused to adjourn—ayes ten, noes not counted.

Mr. CONNESS. Now I ask for the yeas and nays upon the resolution before the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I intend to make a very few remarks on the subject now before the Senate. I understand it to be a parliamentary law that when anything happens directly relating to a member of one of the Houses, and which affects in any manner the other House, and the other House is in possession of the information, it is the duty of the House that has the information on the subject, and that intends to make complaint of it, simply to communicate the information to the House of which the member complained of is a member, and let the House of which he is a member take what course it may please on the subject.

I understand this to be the strict parliamentary law in relation to the matter. The House of Representatives have preferred articles of impeachment against the President; those articles have been under trial before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment; it appears that members of the House and managers of the impeachment have been furnished with some information the tendency of which would be to establish improper approaches to some of the members of the court, and it appears that the House is now engaged in the matter of investigating that imputation. The question is, what is the duty of the House in relation to this matter, and what is the present duty of the Senate in relation to it? We cannot consider the resolution for the information asked for apart from the preamble and resolution which have been read in the Senate this evening. They both necessarily have to be considered together, and they establish this proposition: that the House is now engaged in investigating imputations of improper conduct on the part of members of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of the President, and the House asks of the Senate extracts from its record, the obvious tendency of which is to assist them in the prosecution of the allegation of improper approaches to members of the court. If that be the matter for the consideration of the Senate, in my opinion the Senate ought to withhold the information. It is the duty of the House, according to the courtesies that subsist between the two bodies, according to parliamentary law, if the House is in possession of any information that tends to inculpate any members of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, to communicate that information to the Senate and leave the Senate to act on the communication as it may think proper.

Now, sir, under that operation of what I consider to be the parliamentary law and the courtesies existing between the two Houses, the Senate ought not to proceed to take any notice whatever of the resolution except to lay it upon the table until they receive a communication from the House informing them of such information as they may have in relation to the charges imputed to members of the Senate.

It resolves itself into this question: the House of Representatives are engaged in an inquiry of charges affecting the proper conduct of members of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment; it is prosecuting that inquiry before one of its committees; and it asks for extracts from the records of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, to enable it to prosecute that inquiry. Is it consistent with the rights and the dignity of the Senate that it should sit still, and not only permit this investigation of the House of Representatives in relation to the conduct of its members to continue, but also give facilities to the members of the House who are engaged in the prosecution of that inquiry?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to one point?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The House of Representatives are not asking any assistance from the Senate in prosecuting an inquiry about the proceedings of an outsider, of the President, or of a presidential agent, or anybody else. They are asking for a record which contains only the proceedings of Senators themselves. They are taking our own record, which shows nothing but the proceedings of the Senate itself.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of the House of Representatives, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate are hereby requested to direct that a certified copy of the proceedings for the last two days of the impeachment of the President of the United States be sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am considering that resolution in connection with the preamble to the resolution of the House which was read by the Senator from Wisconsin. The subjects are so intimately connected that their consideration, in my judgment, cannot be separated. They must be considered together, and I am considering them together. It seems to me that the plain purpose of the House, and the information of the Senate in relation to its proceedings, as published in the newspapers, is, that they are engaged now in investigating certain charges against members of the Senate. They have no right to enter upon any such inquiry. If any information comes to the House touching the misconduct of any Senator in relation to the matter of impeachment, as I said before, the parliamentary law and the rule of courtesy between the two Houses would require and demand of the House simply to communicate the information it had upon the subject to the Senate, and to leave the Senate to its own action in relation to it.

The idea that has been suggested by some Senators, and, if I mistake not, by my honorable friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that there are newspaper charges and imputations against members of the Senate that ought to be investigated, in my judgment deserves no sort of consideration. If every newspaper in America was freighted with charges of that kind against members of the Senate I should be for folding my arms and treating them with silent contempt. But when the House of Representatives takes up a matter of that kind and commences an investigation of it, it assumes more of consequence, and probably a form that deserves the attention of the Senate. The matter has been communicated to the Senate by that simple resolution which has been sent to us; but we cannot shut our eyes and minds to the fact that that resolution is connected intimately with the inquiry that is now being prosecuted before a committee of the House, under the authority and order of the House, in relation to the proper conduct of members of the Senate, and in my judgment the Senate ought to give no countenance, no facility whatever, to the further prosecution of that investigation; on the contrary, I believe they ought to enter up a resolution of remonstrance against any such inquiry by the House being prosecuted in relation to members of the Senate, connected with another resolution requesting them if they have any information calculated to inculpate members of the Senate to communicate it to the Senate itself.

Now, I will make a single remark in relation to the denunciation of the President of the United States by the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Massachusetts is a member of the court of impeachment. The President of the United States is under trial before that court, and is presumed by law and by reason to be innocent until his guilt is established by proof. It was proposed, when the Constitution was formed, that the court of impeachment should not be the Senate, but should be the Supreme Court. Suppose that had been the provision of the Constitution, and the Supreme Court were now sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of the President of the United States, and the Chief Justice had made such expressions as to his guilt and had denounced him in the terms in which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, a member of this court of impeachment, has denounced the President of the United States, I ask the Senate if the country, the Senate itself, the world, would have tolerated for a moment any such indecent and outrageous conduct on the part of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, that body sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of the President? No, sir; instead of its being tolerated for a moment the voice of the Senate and the land, so far as it was upright and honest, would have demanded the instant impeachment of the Chief Justice of that court for the expression of such an opinion in relation to the case of a party charged upon articles of impeachment that were under trial. If a member of a court could ever merit impeachment and the condemnation and scorn of the world, it would be the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court so acting and so expressing himself.

I can myself see no difference between what would have been the culpable and execrable conduct of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court in the case which I have supposed and the course and condemnations and denunciations of the Senator from Massachusetts. I believe that for that conduct that Senator deserves richly, and ought to receive, the sentence of expulsion from the Senate of the United States. Certainly, if the Chief Justice who has been presiding over this trial with so much dignity and impartiality had been the chief presiding officer of the Supreme Court under the proposition to make that court the court of impeachment, and he had expressed himself in the very terms in which the Senator from Massachusetts has expressed himself as a member of the Senate, I would feel myself bound, if he were impeached by the House of Representatives, to depose him from the high position which he had so thoroughly degraded and disgraced.

Now, Mr. President, I think that the resolution of the House of Representatives ought to be laid on the table. If the House, as the impeachers of the President of the United States, or if the managers of that impeachment, or any members of the House have such information in relation to any members of the Senate as would inculpate them in regard to their conduct as members at the court of impeachment, it is the duty, it is the courtesy, it is the universal custom between the different Houses of all legislative bodies, that the House that has in its possession the information, and feels itself deeply grieved, should only communicate to the other the information with the names of the guilty parties, and leave the other House to its own rightful and perfectly free judgment to act as it pleases in the premises. I think the Senate ought to take that course now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall propose the following resolution—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This question being before the Senate, no other resolution is in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I propose this as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it first, and see whether it is or not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will read it myself:

Whereas the House of Representatives, by a resolution passed on Saturday last, have recited the following preamble, to wit:

"Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States: Therefore,"

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to furnish the Senate any information which has come to the said House or the managers thereof, tending to show that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate on said impeachment, that the Senate may take proper order thereon in the premises.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin how the Senate knows that any such preamble has been adopted by the House of Representatives?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have read it from the published proceedings of the House of Representatives in the Globe to the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE. I have understood from Senators, upon inquiry this afternoon—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield the floor?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I had not yielded; but if the Senator desires to ask a question I will do so.

Mr. DRAKE. I was simply desiring to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. I asked the question of some Senators here this afternoon whether it was not customary and proper for each House to take cognizance officially of the proceedings of the other House as published in the official organ of both Houses, the Globe, and I was answered that it was not. If that is correct, about which I defer with great respect to the senior Senators here, then I believe the fact to be that the preamble which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin recites in his resolution is not before us in any official form. It is only here, to our knowledge, in the columns of the Globe. If that is so, then I submit to the honorable Senator that it is not proper for us to take any notice of that which has been transacted in the House except simply as it is presented to us in official form by the House itself.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The simple question is whether the fact has been brought to the attention of the Senate? It may be brought to the attention of the Senate by the statement of a Senator; it may be brought to the attention of the Senate by reading from a newspaper; and especially it can be brought to the attention of the Senate from that newspaper which is published under the authority of Congress, and which contains the official proceedings of both bodies.

I do not know the precise motion which has been made in relation to the resolution which came from the House of Representatives, and I will inquire of the Presiding Officer before I go on what is the precise motion pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the passage of the resolution of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; the House sent no resolution. The motion merely is to furnish the document asked for by the House.

Mr. SUMNER. That is all. It was my motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My motion is to amend that resolution by sending to the House of Representatives the resolution which I have sent to the Chair.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that let us take a vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We can take a vote when we get to it, if the honorable Senator from California will allow me.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; I do not propose to adjourn; I am perfectly willing to remain here; but still there are some things that I desire to say in relation to this matter. I think the Senate will make a very great mistake the day that it shall once submit itself to the examination of the House of Representatives, after having passed a resolution that they have information going to show probable cause for believing that corrupt means have been used to influence the Senate in its judgment in the impeachment or in its judgment in any other matter.

The truth is, the independence of this body requires, if it would be independent of the House, that it should take its own members into its own keeping; and if there have been corrupt means used to influence the determination of any member of the body it is for the Senate to investigate, for the Senate to examine, and not for the House. Therefore I submit the resolution requesting the House of Representatives to furnish us the information of which they speak. Let it come to the Senate, and we can appoint a committee to investigate the subject and ascertain the facts.

If the House volunteer to go on and take ex parte testimony, we not assenting at all, it would be a simple breach of courtesy on their part to the Senate; but I think we shall rue the day if we ever consent to furnish the very means which they wish to show that one or more of the Senators have been corruptly influenced in their determination in this high court. I speak with no disrespect to the House of Representatives; but we know the tendency of all bodies is to enlarge their powers and jurisdiction, especially the larger, popular, and more numerous branches over those less numerous, less popular, less in condition to defend themselves. Therefore I think we should meet this right here, meet it on the threshold.

I know it is said they ask as a matter of comity on our part that we furnish them certain information. In a matter of comity I will go as far as any man in the world; but I never go upon the principle of comity when there is an imputation made upon me, and a man desires me to be courteous to him when he is making an imputation that I am influenced by corrupt motives.

Mr. President, there are other things connected with this matter that perhaps ought to be investigated by a committee of this body; and if a committee should be raised on this question of what kind of corrupt influences have been sought to be used with this body, we might go outside of this particular charge. We know very well, and all the world knows, that from this city of Washington telegrams have been sent all over the country by men in position calling upon the people to denounce Senators as recreant to their trust—a direct appeal from the court to the mob outside. When the time comes that an appeal can be made from the highest court of the land to the mob outside to influence its determination, mob-law is to govern and control courts as well as legislative bodies. Sir, it will be a day of sorrow and anguish to the American people if such kind of appeals can be tolerated and justified and sent broadcast, as they have been, all over the land, to undertake to manufacture public opinion and gather it here to influence the conduct of Senators—threats of assassination, threats of personal violence, threats of intimidation of every form!

Mr. President, I can speak with some feeling on this subject, for I have had occasion within the last three years sometimes to vote upon my own responsibility in the midst of denunciation and threats of personal violence, and even attempts to mob me in my own town, because I would not consent to violate what I understood to be my oath. I may have been mistaken; I claim no infallibility; I claim simply an honest purpose; and because I have done it I have been mobbed in my own town and State. Therefore, sir, I can speak with some feeling on this subject. I know that these appeals are made for the purpose of influencing men in these high places. Newspapers are denouncing Senators everywhere, and telegrams are being sent for the purpose of intimidating and influencing men from following the dictates of their own judgment in the determination of this as well as other matters.

Mr. President, I think it is for the Senate to stand upon its own dignity, to defend itself, not to make the first step of concession toward the House so long as the House says in its own resolution that it has information showing that the determination of the Senate has been influenced by corrupt means. It is for us to investigate this matter and not furnish the means to other men to prosecute before another tribunal an investigation which belongs to us.

Gentlemen speak of my desiring to prevent investigation. No, sir; never. I do not wish to prevent any investigation or the fullest investigation in relation to any Senator in this body; and I venture to say that when the investigation takes place, whenever it may be authorized by this body, which has jurisdiction over it, it will show that there is not a particle or shadow of foundation for this alleged rumor. It is all rumor.

Now, Mr. President, I desire that the Senate should act upon this matter. It belongs to us to act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Could we impeach any official who might be implicated?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What can we do about it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This resolution speaks of no officials as being implicated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not speak of any Senator.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It speaks of the Senate being influenced in its determination by corrupt means.

Several SENATORS. No; it does not say that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is precisely what it says.

Mr. CONKLING. An attempt.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; it does not say an attempt.

Mr. YATES. "Means were used."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have it read.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It says they have good cause to believe that the determination of the Senate has been influenced by corrupt motives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have it read and see.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I call on the Clerk to read it.

Mr. SUMNER. I have it here.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let the Clerk read it.

Mr. SUMNER. I have it here, and will read it:

"Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not say that they have been influenced. It looks as though it might apply to the officials that the Senator from Wisconsin seems so anxious to guard.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator says that it may apply to officials that I am anxious to guard. Sir, I repel the imputation.

Mr. POMEROY. The resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin is not in order. Not being germane to the original motion, it cannot be entertained by the Senate while the other motion is pending.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I do not like to have Senators say to me that I desire to guard officials or anybody else from investigation.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will allow this question of order to be settled first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not certain what it was. Let us see what the motion is.

Mr. POMEROY. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts was that the request of the House of Representatives be granted, and upon that motion the Senator from Wisconsin brings in the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The resolution may not be in order; but I supposed I was.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator was speaking upon a resolution not in order before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the honorable Senator one question. How could these corrupt means be used unless the overtures were accepted?

Mr. EDMUNDS. By giving them to an agent and employing him to approach a Senator, who refused to be approached.

Mr. DAVIS. There would be no use in that. It would be a mere attempt to use them.

Several SENATORS. That is what the resolution says.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The resolution avers that the House of Representatives have good cause to believe that corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate.

Several SENATORS. No, no!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish honorable Senators would get the resolution and read its language for themselves. Certainly it reads in that way to me.

Now, Mr. President, I desire not to trespass upon the time of the Senate. I have never done so in my life. But I am speaking on this subject because I earnestly believe that it is our duty on such information to examine this matter for ourselves, and not to give over the examination to the House of Representatives. ["Question!" "Question!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays are ordered; and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move my resolution as a substitute.

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. It is not in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask the opinion of the Chair on that subject. Gentlemen say it is not in order; but I supposed that in place of one resolution I could offer another.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not necessarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If they are independent resolutions, the one first offered must be first acted upon.

Mr. POMEROY. The first offered was the resolution proposing to answer the request of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending question is on the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives a certified copy of the proceedings of the Senate, sitting for the trial of the President of the United States upon articles of impeachment, for the last two days of the trial, as requested in the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 18th instant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin will be read, and then we will endeavor to understand what it is.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution just read by inserting before the word "Resolved" the following preamble:

Whereas the House of Representatives, by a resolution passed on Saturday last, have recited the following preamble, to wit:

"Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States: Therefore."

And after the word "Resolved" it is proposed to insert:

That the House of Representatives be requested to furnish to the Senate any information which has come to said House, or the managers thereof, tending to show that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate on said impeachment, that the Senate may take proper order thereon in the premises.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Do I understand the Chair to decide that my resolution moved as a substitute is not in order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Clearly not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The propositions are entirely independent, having no connection with each other, and the resolution of the Senator can be offered afterward.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will modify my resolution so as to read:

Resolved, That the Senate decline to furnish the information requested, and that the House be respectfully requested to furnish the information, &c.

My proposition is to decline to send them the information asked for, and request them to send us the information they have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Several SENATORS. It is too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is too late.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll on the resolution of Mr. SUMNER, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Howe, Morgan, Nye, Pomerooy, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, McCreery, and Patterson of Tennessee—5.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Corbett, Dixon, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Willey, and Williams—30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms—

Mr. BUCKALEW and Mr. DAVIS. Let the vote be announced by the Chair first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 19 and the nays 5; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move that the Chair direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to find and bring in Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Chair be directed to send the Sergeant-at-Arms for the absentees.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe the usual motion, and the more decorous, is that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of Senators.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

After a pause,

Mr. YATES, (at six o'clock and two minutes.) I think we shall have to wait here all night to get a quorum, and if it is in order I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—yeas 3, noes 10.

Mr. COLE, (at six o'clock and five minutes.) I think some of the Senators who voted on the first call have since absented themselves from the Chamber, and it will be impossible to get a quorum, I think, to-night. I therefore move an adjournment.

Mr. SUMNER. I think there is no use in our staying here.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 18, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TILL THURSDAY.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn till Thursday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will go through the call of States for bills, &c., before putting the question on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion for the present, with the understanding it shall be renewed hereafter.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider. During this call resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented.

ABANDONED PROPERTY IN REBEL STATES.

Mr. POLAND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1082) construing an act for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts in the United States, approved March 12, 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

ELIGIBILITY TO PRESIDENCY.

Mr. ROBINSON introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 269) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution; namely:

That article two, section one, subdivision four, be amended so as to read:

No person, except a citizen of the United States, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Joint resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States are, according to the general usage, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. But unless that reference be moved, this resolution will be referred, as the gentleman suggests, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROBINSON. I prefer the latter reference.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

THANKS TO CAPTAIN DAVID M'DOUGALL.

Mr. COBURN introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 270) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain David McDougall, of the United States Navy, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

TELEGRAPH FROM NEW YORK TO WASHINGTON.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1083) for the construction of a Government telegraph, under the direction of the Post Office Department, between New York and Washington; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF OSAGE RIVER.

Mr. McCLURG presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Missouri, memorializing Congress for a grant of land for the improvement of the Osage river; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

POST ROUTES IN IOWA.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1084) to establish a post route from Leonion to Unionville, in the State of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE also presented a joint resolution and memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, in relation to the establishment of certain post routes; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

DISTRIBUTORS OF REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, asking for the passage of a law making postmasters agents for the distribution of revenue stamps; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

J. KNAPP.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, relative to J. Knapp, company H, fifteenth regiment Iowa volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WISCONSIN RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1085) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin," approved May 5, 1864; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

IOWA RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1086) to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 12, 1864; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI AND YANCTON RAILROAD.

Mr. HOPKINS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1087) to grant lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Mississippi river to Yancton, on the Missouri river, and to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 12, 1864; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. COBB introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 271) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORRVILLE AND VIRGINIA CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the memorial of the Legislature of California, asking for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Orrville to Virginia City, which I move be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I move that reference be made I understand there is a bill now before that committee for this grant of lands. That is the only reason I have for asking it should go to that committee.

Mr. HIGBY. Is not that bill before the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. JOHNSON. I believe not. I will, however, ask the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands for information.

Mr. JULIAN. It is already before the Committee on the Public Lands, and I move this take the same reference.

The motion was agreed to; and the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

AMENDMENT OF THE HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1088) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, approved March 21, 1864, and June 21, 1866, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLEVER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1089) for the relief of the inhabitants of towns and villages in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona who settled upon public land; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

POST ROUTES IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CLEVER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1090) to establish certain post offices and post roads in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

JOHN A. WHITALL.

Mr. CLEVER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1091) for the relief of the legal representatives of Major John A. Whittall, late paymaster in the United States Army, on account of lost or stolen vouchers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

DENVER AND SANTA FÉ RAILROAD.

Mr. CHILCOTT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1092) for the right of way and a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Denver, in the Territory of Colorado, to Santa Fé, in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Territories.

LAWS OF COLORADO.

The SPEAKER presented a copy of the laws of the Territory of Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

REBELLION RECORD.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 292) relative to the rebellion record; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

SARAH E. HERRING.

Mr. ANDERSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1093) for the relief of Sarah E. Herring; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

DEAN ADDISON WILLS.

Mr. HOLMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1094) granting a pension to Dean Addison Wills; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

POST ROUTE IN INDIANA.

Mr. KERR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1095) to establish a certain post route in Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent that the further proceedings of the morning hour be waived to allow the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report upon the treaty for the purchase of Alaska, in order that the report may be referred to the Committee of the Whole, to be taken up at such time hereafter as the House may see fit.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope the regular order will be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. ROBINSON. There will be plenty of time.

RESOLUTIONS.

The call of the States for bills having been completed, the House proceeded, as the next business in order, to the call of the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Ohio, where the call rested last Monday morning.

ACTION OF MISSOURI DELEGATION.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I offer the following preamble and resolution, and demand the previous question thereon:

Whereas it appears by the following letter, purporting to have been written and addressed by seven members of this House to one of the Senators of the United States, which is published in the daily National Intelligencer, published in the city of Washington, to wit:

WASHINGTON, May 12, 1868.

SIR: On a consultation of the Republican members of the House of Representatives from Missouri, in view of your position on the impeachment articles, we ask you to withhold your vote on any article upon which you cannot vote affirmatively. This request is made because we believe the safety of the loyal people of the United States demands the immediate removal of Andrew Johnson from the office of President of the United States.

Respectfully,
GEORGE W. ANDERSON,
WILLIAM A. PILE,
C. A. NEWCOMB,
JOSEPH W. McCLURG,
BENJAMIN F. LOAN,
JOHN F. BENJAMIN,
JOSEPH J. GRAVELLY.

Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, United States Senate. that a combination of the Representatives aforesaid has been entered into to improperly influence the Senator aforesaid in his judgment and decision in the impeachment now pending and undetermined in the Senate; Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to investigate all the circumstances of the writing of said letter, whether the same was written to corrupt or improperly influence the judgment and decision of said Senator, and to report what action, if any, the House ought to take with reference thereto; and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, that they be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and that the committee be instructed to report, without unnecessary delay, at any time.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is not this the same resolution as the one I introduced as a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. It is not exactly the same. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that although the Chair ruled that it was not a question of privilege, yet when the States are called regularly for resolutions the gentleman has a right to offer the resolution, whether it is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio to add to his resolution a provision for an investigation relative to the telegram sent by his colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. Let that be investigated at the same time.

Mr. EGGLESTON. This resolution, I will say, has been introduced at the request of the members from Missouri, and I do not wish to interfere with it by getting any Ohio member mixed up with it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I supposed the gentleman introduced it for the purpose of getting to be chairman of the committee, so as to get just such a report as he thinks would be agreeable to his side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not debatable.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio, who offered this resolution.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I observe that in drafting the resolution the words "it is alleged" have been omitted.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is what I was about to suggest.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I will modify the resolution by inserting the words "it is alleged that" before the words "it appears."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the gentleman mangling my resolution. He is mistaken in supposing that the words "it is alleged" are necessary. It should read "it appears."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio did not present an exact transcript of the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to inquire if the words "it appears" are still in the resolution?

Mr. PAINE. The words "it appears" are still in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, as it has been modified, will be read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Allow me to suggest that the words "it is alleged" would apply to the letter, and the Chair ruled that the letter did not allege any such thing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so rule. The gentleman will please quote the Chair correctly. The gentleman stated that the letter did show corruption, and the Chair stated that in his opinion the letter did not show it, but that he would submit the question to the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood that to be the opinion of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not rule it. He stated it as an expression of his opinion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Well, I will modify my statement, and say that the Chair so expressed his opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair left it for the House to determine.

Mr. PAINE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. PAINE. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. EGGLESTON. And so do I.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROSS. I presume the Missouri delegation can vote on this question, can they not?

The SPEAKER. The roll-call cannot be interrupted. The Clerk will proceed with the call.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 15, nays 84, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Butler, Hooper, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Maynard, Orth, Paine, Peters, Poland, Robertson, Scofield, Thaddeus Stevens, Upson, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Elihu B. Washburne—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Brownell, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, McClurg, McCormick, Mercor, Miller, Morgan, Morrell, Mungen, Myers, Nicholson, O'Neill, Perham, Phelps, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—84.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Benton, Bingham, Broomall, Buckland, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Culom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Getz, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Halburd, Jenckes, Judd, Ketcham, Laflin, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Newcomb, Niblack, Nunn, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Raum, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—90.

So the preamble and resolution were not laid on the table.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I have modified the preamble, and upon the preamble and resolution I renew the call for the previous question.

The preamble and resolution, as modified, were read, as follows:

Whereas the following letter has been written and addressed by seven members of this House to one of the Senators of the United States:

WASHINGTON, May 12, 1868.

Sir: On a consultation of the Republican members of the House of Representatives from Missouri, in view of your position on the impeachment articles, we ask you to withhold your vote on any article upon which you cannot vote affirmatively. This request is made because we believe the safety of the loyal people of the United States demands the immediate removal of Andrew Johnson from the office of President of the United States.

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. ANDERSON,
WILLIAM A. PILE,
C. A. NEWCOMB,
JOSEPH W. MCCLURG,
BENJAMIN F. LOAN,
JOHN F. BENJAMIN,
JOSEPH J. GRAVELY.

Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, United States Senate.

and whereas it is alleged that a combination of the Representatives aforesaid has been entered into to improperly influence the Senator aforesaid in his judgment and decision in the impeachment now pending and undetermined in the Senate: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to investigate all the circumstances connected with the writing of said letter, whether the same was written to corrupt or improperly influence the judgment and decision of said Senator, and to report what action the House ought to take with reference thereto, and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, that they be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and that the committee be instructed to report without unnecessary delay and at any time.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

Mr. EGGLESTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved that the latter motion be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. EGGLESTON. In consequence of my being under the necessity of leaving the city within a day or two, I must ask to be excused from serving on the select committee just ordered.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT TOLEDO, OHIO.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House of the condition of the custom-house and post office at Toledo, Ohio, and what appropriation is needed for such additions and repairs to said building as have been reported necessary for the safety of the public property and the safe conduct of the public business therein; also whether the interests of the Government would not be better subserved by selling the present building and erecting a new one.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT TRIAL—CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Mr. BOYER submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the managers of the impeachment of the President, in addition to their original and proper powers and duties as such managers, have, by a resolution of the House on Saturday last, been converted into a committee of investigation, and have been authorized and instructed to investigate whether improper or corrupt influences have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States, and for that purpose have been instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, and to appoint sub-committees to take testimony; and whereas it is in accordance with common usage, as well as obviously proper and essential to a fair and impartial investigation of the truth, that upon every committee of investigation selected by a deliberative body the minority should to some extent be represented; and whereas the managers of the impeachment were originally appointed solely for the purposes of prosecution, and consist altogether of avowed political enemies of the President of the United States, and are instructed as prosecuting officers to convict him, if possible, of high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized and instructed to appoint from among those members of the House who voted against the impeachment of the President two persons to be added to the committee of managers, while acting as a committee of investigation for the purposes aforesaid, and who shall be authorized to be present and participate in the examination of witnesses in relation to the aforesaid charges of corrupt and improper influences alleged to have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. If the resolution gives rise to debate, it must go over under the rules.

Mr. BOYER. I call for the previous question.

Mr. WARD. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to put a question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer any parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SCHENCK. This resolution, I believe, is offered under the call of States.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SCHENCK. Cannot the question of its reception be raised?

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration can be raised upon any resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to raise that question. Among the recitals of the resolution it is stated that the managers were selected as "avowed political enemies of the President of the United States," and are "instructed to convict him if possible."

Mr. ROBINSON. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that the question can be raised on the consideration of the resolution. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"When any motion or proposition is made, the question, Will the House now consider it? shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker."

The SPEAKER. In accordance with this rule the Chair will, on the demand of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] put the question, Will the House now consider the resolution?

Mr. BOYER. I hope the House will allow me five minutes to explain the resolution.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order without unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object.

Mr. BOYER. I demand the yeas and nays on the question, Will the House now consider the resolution?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 69, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Mungen, Nicholson, Phelps, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, and Woodward—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bromwell, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Gravely, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Maynard, McClurg, Mercor, Morrell, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Windom—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Culom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Judd, Knott, Laflin, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Newcomb, Niblack, Pile, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Raum, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—93.

So the House refused to consider the resolution.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. BANKS. I ask consent of the House that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have leave now to report a bill relative to the execution of the treaty with Russia for the purchase of Alaska, together with a majority report, and also that the minority have leave to present at this time a report on the same subject. My desire is that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I do not expect that it will be called up before some time in the month of June. I expect to be absent during the first week of that month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS?]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the rules be suspended.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKS. I now ask unanimous consent to present a communication from the Secretary of State, giving the correspondence as to the extension of time, and to move that it be referred to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ST. PAUL'S ISLAND FISHERIES.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, presented a letter from the Secretary of State, in response to a resolution of the House, concerning contracts entered into, or proposed by private citizens, for the occupation of St. Paul's island, in Behring's sea; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ALASKA—AGAIN.

Mr. PRUYN. I rise for information. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to give notice that he will call up the bill in reference to Alaska in the second week in June.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to be absent until the first week in June. The bill cannot be considered this month.

PRINTING OF REPORTS.

Mr. CHANLER. From the importance of the subject of the treaty with Alaska, would it not be proper to have extra copies of the reports from the Committee on Foreign Affairs ordered to be printed? I move that extra copies of the majority and minority reports, together with the papers sent to us from the Secretary of State, be printed for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. The minority report has not yet been presented.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I present the minority report, and move that it be ordered to be printed with the majority report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that five thousand extra copies of the majority and minority reports be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion, under the law, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF CHARLES S. BULKLEY.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent to present to the House the report of Charles S. Bulkley, chief engineer, in regard to the Territory of Alaska, from his own personal observation. I suppose it embraces twenty-five or thirty pages in print. He was an officer of the Army, one of the ablest engineers of the Army, and is a man of great integrity and great energy. I move that the report be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOYER. I move that Mr. VAN AUKEN be granted leave of absence for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. Leave of absence is also asked for Mr. PETERS, Mr. JENCKES, and Mr. MAILLOREY.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent of the House for five minutes, for the purpose of personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I will read from an article in the New York Tribune, furnished by its Washington correspondent, in the issue of Saturday last, the following paragraph:

"TRUMBULL is accused of recreancy and treachery on every side by Republicans. INGERSOLL is the only man of the Illinois delegation and the only member of the House who follows him, so far as I have been able to gather."

I wish to say, in regard to that correspondent, whoever he may be, that he labors under a misapprehension in reference to my position. I am not following Senator TRUMBULL or any other Senator in reference to impeachment.

I also wish to make a remark concerning a communication in the New York Herald of Saturday last, written by its Washington correspondent. I read as follows:

"There is considerable indignation at E. C. INGERSOLL among his colleagues from Illinois, because he is understood to sympathize with Senator TRUMBULL on the impeachment proceedings. INGERSOLL is the only member of the Radical delegation in the House from Illinois who has taken this course, and his motives are freely impugned."

The only ground upon which this can be based, in my opinion, is from some action of the Illinois delegation, had four or five days ago, to which, perhaps, I may be allowed to refer. The Illinois delegation held a meeting, that is, the Republican members of that delegation, and a proposition was submitted, which, perhaps, I have a right to state, as there was no secrecy about it.

I shall not name the particular members, as none but my own name has been referred to. A proposition was submitted to send a letter to Senator TRUMBULL, expressing the views of the Illinois delegation on the subject of impeachment, with a view to influencing his vote for conviction, or with a view of inducing him to withhold his vote, if he could not vote for conviction. I objected to sending such a letter, and so did three or four of my colleagues. I will not name them, as I have no authority to use their names in this connection. There were at least four, and perhaps five, of the Illinois delegation who objected to signing any letter directed to Mr. TRUMBULL upon the subject of his vote. That is all that was said or done, one way or the other, in reference to Senator TRUMBULL, and no letter was sent, to my knowledge. There is no feeling of indignation on the part of any of my colleagues in the House toward me, and there is no reason why there should be. So far as I know, I am on cordial relations with all of them. The writer proceeds to state that—

"Mr. INGERSOLL is the only member of the Radical delegation in the House from Illinois who has taken this course, and his motives are freely impugned."

The writer is mistaken with regard to that. Upon that question four Republican members in this House from Illinois viewed the propriety or impropriety of that course precisely as I did. The article then proceeds to state that—

"He [INGERSOLL] voted for impeachment, but explains his action now by saying he was compelled to do it, though he felt at the time that it was a party blunder."

In answer to that I wish to state, in justice to myself, that I voted for impeachment for the reason that the managers presented to my mind a prima facie case against the President. I voted for the articles of impeachment because I believed it was my duty to do so. I have never since felt that it was a blunder; neither have I ever had reason to change my views on that subject, nor have I expressed any change of views. The writer goes on to say:

"The board of managers are after his committee clerk with a view to ascertain whether any outside pressure was brought to bear to make him adopt TRUMBULL'S opinions."

The assumption of this writer to which I wish to call attention is this: that some outside pressure has been brought to bear which has caused me to adopt Senator TRUMBULL'S opinions. I do not know what Senator TRUMBULL'S opinions are. I never asked him for them, neither have they ever been communicated to me. I have never had a conversation with him on the subject of the impeachment of the President or how he intended to vote on any article, and I never expect to. How he intends to vote on the remaining ten articles I have no knowledge. I might assume from the vote he has already given how he will vote, but I know nothing about it. I have not adopted Senator TRUMBULL'S opinions or any other Senator's opinions, and for that matter I have no reason to expect to. So far as any outside pressure is concerned, I know nothing about it. I have not felt it. I have endeavored to discharge my duty and to mind my own business, and I think I have succeeded reasonably well thus far.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, obtained the floor to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but yielded to

Mr. JONES, who rose to a privileged question, and presented the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas this House did, in bad judgment and hot haste, pass a resolution and articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and appointed managers to conduct the suit before the high court of the Senate; and whereas it has been abundantly proven that there was no cause or plausible pretext for the same; and whereas the Senate and the country labor under great excitement and embarrassment: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That said managers be instructed forthwith to withdraw said suit, that the House may be redeemed, the Senate relieved, and the country given repose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not yield for that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule on the question. He thinks this is not a question of privilege. The preamble contains a reflection on the House. It is unparliamentary on the part of any member to reflect upon the action of the House in the language used in the preamble.

Mr. JONES. There was no intention to reflect on the House.

The SPEAKER. It does, however, in express language.

Mr. JONES. I understood that the Speaker ruled that anything relating to impeachment was a privileged question. If the Chair did not so rule I am mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled in regard to impeachment probably a hundred times. His rulings are all consistent, and will be found in the Congressional Globe. The gentleman stated the ruling more broadly than the Chair ever stated it himself.

Mr. JONES. Does the Speaker now rule that it is not a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that it is not. On the contrary, that it is not a parliamentary preamble and resolution for the consideration of the House, not being respectful in its terms to the House.

ARTIFICIAL PROPAGATION OF FISH.

Mr. MYERS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me to introduce a joint resolution, and if there is any objection to its passage I will move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the sum of $2,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from the Treasury of the United States to defray the necessary expenses of the experiments by Seth Green in the artificial propagation of shad and other fish in the rivers of the United States, and that the money hereby appropriated shall be expended under the supervision of F. E. Spinner, Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to have read a letter from General Spinner in regard to this matter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Oh, no; I object. We have a great deal too much shad in this city now, any way. [Laughter.]

Mr. MYERS. I ask, then, that the joint resolution, with the letter of General Spinner, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 273) making an appropriation for the expenses of experiments in the propagation of fish was read a first and second time, and, with the letter of General Spinner, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the letter of General Spinner may be printed in the Globe.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. The letter of General Spinner is as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, May 17, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: Our little experiment is a perfect success. From the half teaspoonful of impregnated shad spawn that you brought me on Wednesday evening there are now—Sunday evening—hundreds of lively young shad in the tumbler that we placed in my wash-basin. Now, if we can hatch hundreds of shad in a half-pint tumbler in four days, would you not be able to put thousands of millions in our rivers if Congress would only give your plan the encouragement that it deserves? If Congress will make an appropriation for the purpose, my word for it, in three years all the rivers thus cared for would literally swarm with this valuable fish. It would greatly lessen the price of fish and of other food to a degree, and would greatly add to the wealth of the country. Congress could do no better act than follow the example of France and other enlightened nations; and if they are really the friends of the poor should make an appropriation for the purpose of restocking our fish-exhausted streams.

Very truly, yours,
F. E. SPINNER.

SETH GREEN, esq., Washington, D. C.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me to offer a resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Certainly. Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Be it resolved, That the Senate are hereby requested to direct that a certified copy of the proceedings of the last two days in the trial of the impeachment of the President of the United States be sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BROOKS. Have we not a copy in the Globe—a certified, official copy?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I believe not; I think not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What proceedings is the resolution intended to cover?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I propose to ask for the last two days' proceedings.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Have they not been published in the ordinary reports such as they have furnished to us at each day's session of the court?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I only ask for the proceedings of two days.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I inquire of the gentleman if the House has not been furnished day by day with the ordinary reports of the proceedings in the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not know; I have not had them.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he has any objection to add a call for the report of the testimony taken before the committee of investigation for the impeachment. I understand that there are no copies left, and it will be very valuable.

The SPEAKER. That would not be germane to this resolution. This is a resolution asking the Senate to send certain matters to the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does this resolution relate to the secret sessions of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it relates to the secret sessions of the Senate?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It relates to everything that took place on the last two days of the session.

Mr. ALLISON. That will not cover Monday.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It does not seem to me that the House is justified in calling for the proceedings of the secret sessions of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there has been no secret session of the Senate for the last two days.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then we have the proceedings already before us.

Mr. BOYER. I rise to a question of order. It is this: that it is not competent for this House, by a resolution of this kind, to compel the Senate to furnish these proceedings except under an order of their own.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER;] that is, that this House has no power to compel the Senate to do it. But the two Houses very often ask each other for matters which are subject to the action of that House. For instance, the House often asks the Senate to return a bill which has been sent to it, but that request is not at all mandatory.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to state what particular thing he expects to get from the Senate? Does he want something not disclosed in the resolution or does he really want the whole proceedings?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to get from the Senate the vote as given by the different Senators upon the articles of impeachment we have sent to that body. I have no other object than to get a certified copy of that vote.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is published in the Globe, is it not?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not know whether it is or not. There is no certified official record that I know of published in the Globe. I have no particular objection to modify my resolution in such way as members may think proper. If there can be language employed that would be more respectful, I will use it; but I do not know of any.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not think there is any objection to allowing the gentleman to have anything he wants of the proceedings of the Senate. We all like to know what is going on there.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] object to the resolution?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not, though I think it is entirely useless, for the same information has been furnished through the Globe.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to have it for the plain reason that the record of those votes has never come to this body in an official shape, and I desire it in that shape. There will undoubtedly be some further proceedings had in regard to this impeachment; what those proceedings will be I do not know. I suppose that we shall be asked in some way or other to vote upon the articles which are still before the Senate. I suppose we shall yet be called upon, in some way or other, to give our votes upon the different questions which are before the Senate of the United States at present. I know that there are questions of great importance; I know that there are questions of great value still before the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment.

While I have no desire to make a speech upon the question, which is now a bygone question, yet I do not suppose that anybody believes that the question which was passed upon on Saturday last is to remain a defunct question. I do not suppose that anybody believes that that question is to be carried to the country in its present condition. And hence it is that I suppose that everybody ought to desire to see exactly how it is. I presume that the vote which will be taken upon that will come before this body within a few days in such shape as shall develop and unfold the great acts and truths which have been enacted, and which have transpired within the last week.

I make no accusations; I charge nobody with anything. But to me it seems amazing that a body of that kind, having before it a body of men of the highest character, will give to themselves and to others the character which they have given, and which they feel disposed to stamp upon the country. This body of men being about to see this proud people looking down upon them as men never before were gazed upon by a disappointed world, I think that it is right that all these things should be laid before the community.

I do not suppose for a single moment that there is anywhere to be found a body of men who have determined to prosecute the great criminal, who was so charged to be and is yet, from his position by anything but fair and legitimate means. We are, therefore, asking that, as these matters have been sent before the Senate for the purpose of being investigated, every opportunity shall be allowed for the purpose of ascertaining who have been willing to listen and who have refused to listen to the instruction of the accused. That there has been great, manifold, deep damnation, and that there is somewhere to be found the greatest of all mysteries, the mystery of this great prevalence of evil, no one can doubt. Let us therefore have the whole matter in such a shape that there may be every opportunity to investigate, so that all men may see who it is that is wrong, and who it is that is right.

I call for the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the gentleman whether he thinks Senators would be justifiable in perjuring themselves for the purpose of procuring the conviction of the President?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Well, sir, I do not think it would hurt them much. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he offers this resolution on behalf of the board of managers or on his own responsibility?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is my own individual action.

Mr. WOODWARD. I ask my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] to allow me five minutes on this question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no five minutes to yield.

Mr. WOODWARD. Then I ask the House to give me five minutes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it in order to move to give the rules for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Pennsylvania an opportunity to speak?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MAYNARD. I renew the objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. UPSON. Is that motion in order pending the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is, as the gentleman will find by reference to that part of the Manual relative to suspension of the rules.

Mr. WOODWARD. If my colleague will withdraw the call for the previous question, he can yield me the floor for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to granting my colleague five minutes if he desires it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] had moved the previous question and taken his seat; and I object to his farming out the floor in this way. I want fair dealing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, having offered this resolution, was entitled to the floor to speak for one hour; and if he withdraws the call for the previous question he can either occupy the hour himself or yield it to other gentlemen.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. After he has demanded the previous question and taken his seat?

The SPEAKER. No vote has been taken on seconding the call for the previous question, and the gentleman withdraws the call, as he has the right to do, and resumes the floor. If the previous question had been seconded the gentleman could not have resumed the floor. The gentleman yields five minutes to his colleague, [Mr. WOODWARD.]

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, I would not have said anything on this subject but for the remarks of my colleague. If I had not heard those remarks I would have voted for his resolution; but after hearing them, it is impossible for me to do so. And I wish to take this opportunity to say that in my judgment this whole thing is in the highest degree indelicate and improper. Whatever may be the technical difficulties about considering the Senate as a court in the matter of impeachment, there can be no doubt in the mind of my colleague or any other man that Senators are sitting under the obligations of a judicial oath, and for all practical purposes they are sitting as judges in a case which is peculiarly judicial. They have heard the evidence, they have heard the argument of counsel, they have decided one count in the indictment, and now, while they are deliberating on their judgment on the remaining articles of impeachment, I say it is in the highest degree indelicate—I mean no personal offense when I add indecent—for the prosecutor to come in with resolutions calculated to influence the judgment of that court. Why, where in this broad land has the like before ever been witnessed, that a party may institute a prosecution and go before a judge, present his case, and while that judge is deliberating upon that case, set in operation a series of influences intended to bear upon the judgment of that court in that case? Where have you ever witnessed that before? Where has the venerable gentleman ever seen anything of the kind before? His professional life has been spent in Pennsylvania, and where did he ever hear before of a party approaching a judge or court where a case was committed to that court and advising or threatening them or promising them or in any manner attempting to influence the judgment of the court in that case? Why, with all of his experience, he never before heard anything of the kind.

Now, I ask, in all seriousness, is this House prepared to place itself before the world, a party having submitted his case to a constitutional tribunal, as worrying that judge, as annoying that judge, as threatening that court with uncomfortable consequences unless he decides that case in our favor? Are we prepared to place ourselves in that position? There is not a man who, approaching a court and threatening a court of justice in that spirit and manner, would not be committed to prison for contempt.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. My colleague will allow me to say that I do not propose to use the material which we shall get in any way injurious to the court now in session.

Mr. WOODWARD. I said that I was in favor of the resolution itself. In my opinion it is unnecessary and unmeaning; but I do not object to the resolution. It is to the gentleman's speech with which he expounded that resolution that I am making this objection. If I understand the gentleman, he wants the information for the purpose of "exposing these Senators to the world," "holding them to their responsibility." I cannot recover all his language; but his language implies that there is to be some sort of discipline used upon these Senators upon the information this resolution calls for.

Now, sir, against that sentiment, whether coming from gentlemen in support of the resolution or coming from correspondence with a Senator or coming from a conversation with a Senator—come I care not how—against all that meddling with that tribunal while deliberating upon this high and important case I enter my earnest and solemn protest as a thing indecible in the highest degree and indecent.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WOODWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. LYNCH. The gentleman speaks of the Senate as a constitutional tribunal. I ask him if he considers the Senate now a constitutional tribunal? I think he questioned that once in this House.

Mr. WOODWARD. If the House will yield to me five minutes more I will answer that question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes are about expiring.

Mr. WOODWARD. I am aware of that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope the House will give the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. That depends upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I cannot yield, though I should be glad to. I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is entitled to the floor, and will now state whether he demands the previous question or what action he desires.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] if he will call the previous question at the close of his remarks.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it is required of me I will do so. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the resolution read which has been pronounced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] to be indecent.

Mr. WOODWARD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he may not put words into my mouth. So far from pronouncing the resolution indecent I said expressly that I would vote for it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I heard the word "indecent."

Mr. WOODWARD. Yes, sir; but that was applied to the speech my colleague made in support of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand the gentleman. If he applied the word "indecent" to his colleague it would be unparliamentary. The Chair understood him to say that some supposed action of the House might be indecent.

Mr. WOODWARD. The Chair is right. I did not intend anything unparliamentary or uncivil to my colleague. I intended to characterize the purpose for which this information was wanted. I meant to characterize the use that was to be made of this information as highly indelicate, and, I might say, without intending personal offense, indecent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have not yielded my time. If the gentleman says he did not charge that the proceeding of his colleague was indecent then I was mistaken, and I will not assume that he did. I heard the word distinctly twice, either as applied to what was said by the gentleman's colleague in support of his resolution or as applied to the proceeding which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] sought to institute. In either case it comes with a very bad grace from a man who should not be upon this floor unless sustained here by a degree of assurance which I can hardly think possible to exist in any case—justifying in his opinion his presence here—a man who has denounced this as no Congress, as a fragmentary body, a usurping body.

Mr. WOODWARD. I beg to call the gentleman to order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not using exactly the language of the gentleman, but I will give his language so that he will see whether I overstated it.

Mr. WOODWARD. The gentleman not only does not use the exact language, but he does not use anything like the language.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing to be corrected by the gentleman. I have his language in my hand.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot argue the question.

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not propose to argue it. I am only rising to correct the gentleman in his statement. What the gentleman alludes to is an argument made by me on this floor as fully as the rules of the House would allow me to make it, in which I held that neither this House nor the Senate—

Mr. SCHENCK. I am going to read the gentleman's language; I do not want his gloss upon it. And I am the more disposed to do this because I had prepared a resolution of expulsion for the use of this language, and was only prevented from offering it by the expectation that another gentleman who had taken a share in the debate would proceed against him.

On the 24th of February last, when this subject of impeachment was under discussion, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] said:

"I conclude all the legislation we have done does not constitute us the court to originate and try impeachments which the Constitution contemplates."

"Mr. Speaker, so sure I am that the American people will respect this objection that I will say, if I were the President's counselor—which I am not—I would advise him, if you prefer articles of impeachment, to demur both to your jurisdiction and that of the Senate, and to issue a proclamation giving you and all the world notice that while he held himself impeachable for misdemeanors in office before the constitutional tribunal, he never would subject the office he held in trust for the people to the irregular, unconstitutional, fragmentary bodies who propose to strip him of it. Such a proclamation, with the Army and Navy in hand to sustain it, would meet a popular response that would make an end of impeachment and impeachers."

That man, professing to be himself a member of the American Congress and drawing pay as such—he takes care of that, I presume—stands here and denounces the proceeding under the Constitution by this House to impeach and by the Senate to try that impeachment as proceedings not legitimately to be entered upon by either, because he says of both that they are but fragmentary bodies, and declares that he, if he were the adviser of the President, would disperse them by force, for that is virtually what his threat amounts to. I do not wish any gentleman here or outside of this House to take my representation of his language as being a proper or improper interpretation of that language, and therefore I have read what he said, and from the official report of the proceedings of this Congress. I aver that he dared to stand here and denounce this as no House of Representatives entitled to find articles of impeachment and present them, and the Senate as no body entitled under the law to try the impeachment, and that he went further, and gave notice, in the shape of a threat, that if he were the President he would step in and disperse these two fragmentary bodies, and thus put an end to the impeachment and the impeachers also. Sir, I repeat what I said. I had prepared a resolution to expel that member from this floor as unworthy of a seat in the body of which he thus speaks, and was only prevented from doing it—

Mr. MARSHALL. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not discussing the question before the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is he not?

Mr. MARSHALL. I object, unless it is understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] shall have an opportunity to reply to his attacks upon him, which is nothing but a personal attack.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution; and, under the rules, the gentleman from Ohio must confine his remarks to the resolution, since the point of order is made.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is the subject before the House, and the debate must be confined to it, now the point of order is made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I hold that what I have been saying is entirely pertinent to this proceeding; and if the gentleman would follow out the position that he has taken, and declare that we, being no House of Representatives, have no right to make that request of the Senate, and that the Senate, being no legal body, can have kept no record of their proceedings when acting either in a legislative or any other capacity, he would be consistent with what he has said before. But he puts his opposition to the resolution upon an entirely different ground, and shrinking, perhaps—although I do not know whether he does or not—from the bold assurance with which he advanced revolutionary doctrines like that, he now prefers to content himself by speaking disparagingly either of the resolution or what it proposes to do, or of the remarks of his colleague, by which that resolution was sought to be sustained; and I say, and therefore I am pertinent in this debate, that it comes with an ill grace, to say the least of it, from the gentleman from Pennsylvania to oppose that resolution upon any such ground as that, when he has heretofore taken that high, audacious position, which he stands recorded as having maintained heretofore in debate upon this subject of impeachment, that we have no power to impeach, we have no power to inquire into these matters, that there is no Senate of whom to make inquiry, and that the Senate and the House alike ought, if the President were properly advised, as he feels capable of advising him, to have been dispersed. I did not rise for any purpose of discussing the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or their tendency. If there ever occurs a time when it may be proper to do so I shall be glad to enter on that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that, notwithstanding his argument, the Chair thinks that this is beyond the scope of the resolution before the House. The former speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in review before the House. The remarks then made by him could have been excepted to at the time by any member, and the Chair would have ruled upon them. The point of order being made by the gentleman from Illinois, the Chair rules that the remarks are not in order.

Mr. KELLEY. The remarks referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] were never made in the House, if the gentleman will permit me to say so; they were printed in the Globe, but were never uttered upon this floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes; I remember that as one of the circumstances.

Mr. WOODWARD. I trust, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SCHENCK. I was on the floor, I believe. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, it is not competent to show the inconsistency between positions heretofore taken by the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] and the position now taken by him upon this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not competent to do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; then I shall have to return the floor, with thanks, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. WOODWARD. I ask my colleague to allow me the floor long enough to reply to the personal remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not know whether, under the ruling of the Chair, there have been personal remarks or not. I understand the Chair to rule personal remarks out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] that the continuance of his remarks, in the line in which they were made before, would be beyond the scope of the resolution. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] yields to his colleague, and any gentleman objects to his remarks, the Chair must rule upon them.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] comments upon this speech of his I will desire to follow out my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must rule the same as before if any one makes the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not very well see how I can yield, if my colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] is going to answer what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I shall be very glad to give them a fair fight. [Laughter.] They are an admirable couple; about the same size. But I can not see, under the circumstances, but what I would be giving one the advantage of the other by thus pulling the gentleman from Ohio off and letting my colleague up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will yield to his colleague the same amount of time that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] had, and upon the same subject, and that no point of order will be taken upon him.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to give notice that I shall insist upon the debate being confined to the resolution. This is not the first time that the proceedings of this House have been characterized as indecent; and I will not sit in my place here and hear it done again by the same man, if I can help it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I decline to yield unless the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] can be allowed to reply.

Mr. WOODWARD. I desire to have the floor to reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to move to suspend the rules, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will yield to me, so as to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] to have the floor for thirty minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I cannot see very well how I can give way to one gentleman without I do it to both. I should be very willing to yield to both, for I feel very much in the mood to see a little contest this afternoon [laughter] between my respectable colleague from Pennsylvania and my equally respectable friend from Ohio. But I cannot see how I can do it.

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will allow me, I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] to withdraw his point of order upon the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] because it is that point of order that prevents the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] from speaking. I am desirous that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] shall have an opportunity to reply, but he cannot do so until the point of order is withdrawn from the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have not yet got half through. And I will now say—

Mr. ROBINSON. When can I get the floor to move a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. Not while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is on the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Very well; I now call the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now move to suspend the rules, in order to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] fifteen minutes to reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. ALLISON. Let the vote be taken upon this resolution first.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will it be in order for me to move a suspension of the rules after this resolution has been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] to make that motion at that time.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I will withdraw the motion for the present.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1062) to grant right of way to the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now move that the rules be suspended, to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] fifteen minutes to reply to the observations that have been made concerning him by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. And fifteen minutes to my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. ROBINSON. My motion is intended to include only the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANLER. Say fifteen minutes also for the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is giving the gentleman from Ohio more time than the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but I accede to the suggestion, and modify my motion so as to allow fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, and two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania in conclusion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have not asked for fifteen minutes, and it will depend entirely upon what the gentleman from Pennsylvania may say whether I shall occupy any time in reply.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to make a proposition which I think will be satisfactory all around. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who has charge of the bill making appropriations for the Indian service, is not new in the House; and I propose to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this bill for general debate. Then all these gentlemen can be heard.

Mr. ROBINSON. With the understanding that, if the motion of the gentleman from Illinois be adopted, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be entitled to the floor, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is the understanding.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois the Chair must submit to the House the question of granting leave of absence to several gentlemen, objection having been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] asked leave of absence for his colleague [Mr. VAN AUKEN] for two weeks, and the Chair asked indefinite leave of absence for the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PETERS,] and the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. MALLORY.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not know whether I am at liberty to say anything.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. All I can say is, that if leave be granted to these gentlemen it will break up the House.

A MEMBER. These gentlemen are gone already.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Then they ought to be punished. That is a good reason for voting against granting them leave.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, how many more than a quorum are now in attendance?

The SPEAKER. Three or four only.

Mr. ELIOT. Then if leave of absence be granted to these gentlemen we shall be left without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Several of these gentlemen are now absent. The Chair will submit the question. Will the House grant leave of absence for two weeks to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. VAN AUKEN,] and indefinitely to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PETERS,] and the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. MALLORY?]

Leave was granted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands this objection as giving notice to members of the House that future requests for leave of absence may be objected to.

ISSUING OF MILITARY ORDERS.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House whether any order from the War Department has been issued, directed to any military or other officer, without having gone through the General of the Army, since the passage of the act of March 2, 1867, which requires all orders and instructions relating to military operations issued by the President or Secretary of War shall be issued through the General of the Army, and in case of his inability through the next in rank.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor to move to suspend the rules, and two motions to suspend the rules cannot be entertained at the same time.

Mr. ROBINSON. That law is being violated.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MAYNARD. I renew the motion, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was disagreed to.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the committee of investigation ordered this morning: Mr. SCOFIELD of Pennsylvania, Mr. LAWRENCE of Ohio, Mr. ELDRIDGE of Wisconsin.

sin, Mr. COBURN of Indiana, and Mr. FERRISS of New York.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and proceeded to consider House bill No. 1073, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

Mr. BROOKS. I object. I want the bill read through.

Mr. HARDING. I hope we will proceed with the business of the House.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

The committee informally rose; and a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, requesting the House to return the resolution for adjournment over until the 25th instant, disagreed to by the Senate.

The request was granted.

Mr. SCHENCK. The resolution for adjournment over having been sent for, and as it is likely it will be acted on in a few minutes, if gentlemen desire to vote on it, it is desirable they should remain here, so as not to leave the House without a quorum. There is barely a quorum present now. The Senate will have to amend the resolution as it reads now, "shall adjourn from Saturday, the 16th instant, to Monday, the 25th instant," and it will be necessary for a quorum to be here to concur in that amendment.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the committee rise in order to get out of this difficulty.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to make that motion during the reading of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 19; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voting, under the rules, the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll having been called, the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Finney, Fox, Getz, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, McCulloch, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Perham, Peters, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Raum, Sawyer, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Aukon, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER. Only eighty-one members having answered to their names. No quorum having answered, the only motions in order are that there be a call of the House and that the House adjourn.

Mr. BANKS. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

SURVEY OF THE POTOMAC RIVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the chief of engineers, covering a report by General Michler on the examination and survey of the Potomac river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

J. M. BEST.

On motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Dr. J. M. Best, of Paducah, Kentucky, copies of the same being left on file.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ELDRIDGE, to adjourn, it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Would it be in order now to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD?]

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent it would be. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDING. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the objection.

Mr. HARDING. I do not want any more debate.

The question being taken on the motion for a call of the House, it was agreed to—ayes 60.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Ela, Finney, Fox, Getz, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Jenckes, Judd, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, McCarthy, McCulloch, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Niblack, Peters, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Aukon, Robert T. Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and four members having answered to their names, a quorum is now in attendance.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. If there is any objection now to allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] to proceed, as was agreed all around, I shall move to suspend the rules. I hope there will be none.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. Speaker, the House was in the Committee of the Whole, and the order to go into the Committee of the Whole has not been vacated.

The SPEAKER. The House came out of the Committee of the Whole, finding itself without a quorum; the roll was then called, and the House finding a quorum in attendance the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] moved to suspend the rules to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania to speak.

On suspending the rules there were thirty-eight ayes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. If the motion of the gentleman from New York is voted down the House immediately resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole by the rules.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. So the House refused to suspend the rules.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The House, under the rules, resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 1073, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Would it not now be in order, before proceeding with the further reading of the bill, to move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] be allowed to proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill cannot be interrupted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I shall give up all efforts to get the floor for the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, as this bill will be read by sections for amendment, the present reading will be of no great value. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to dispensing with the first reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana renews the request that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, which requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair takes occasion to state that the roll-call having just revealed the presence of a quorum, he hopes members will remain in their seats in anticipation of a message from the Senate. It would be very awkward to find the House without a quorum when the committee rises.

Mr. RAUM. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House No. 1073, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1869, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 170) to provide for deficiency of expenses incurred in survey of Indian reservations, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House No. 19, concerning certain lands granted to railroad companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to offer a preamble and resolutions on the subject of Alaska, and to have them referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and printed, so that they may be considered when the bill comes up which was referred to the committee this morning.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I reserve the right to object until the preamble and resolutions are read.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolutions, as follows:

Whereas the treaty of purchase with Russia of March 30, 1867, having been communicated by the President to the House; and it being necessary, before the stipulations of such treaty can be carried into effect, that laws for that purpose should be enacted by Congress; and it appearing by the stipulations of said treaty that the cession with right of possession was to be deemed complete upon the exchange of ratifications; and it appearing further that the President of the United States has already taken possession sion of said territory without authority from Congress so to do; thus, by the provisions of the treaty and by such subsequent acts thereunder, apparently denying the right of this House to exercise its discretion in relation to the passage of the laws necessary to carry the treaty into effect; to the end that the opinion of the House in relation to its powers and prerogatives may be understood, and that no action in relation to this treaty may be misconstrued:

1. Resolved, That as the Constitution delegates to the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the treaty-making power, the House of Representatives claims no agency in making treaties. Yet as the Constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and provides further that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, where a compact made by the treaty-making power with a foreign Government stipulates for the purchase of territory from such foreign Government, and for the payment of money by the United States therefor, such stipulation for the payment of money cannot be carried into effect without an act of Congress making an appropriation for that purpose, and that it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in such case to deliberate upon the expediency or inexpediency of making such appropriation, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment will be most conducive to the public good, and to that end either to make such appropriation or refuse it, in their discretion.

2. Resolved, That the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, has not the constitutional power by treaty to extend the area of this Government, and bring within its jurisdiction foreign territory, without the consent of Congress; and until such consent is given no compact to that end is valid or binding upon the Government of the United States; and no officer of the United States has any right or authority to take possession of such territory for the Government until authorized by law of Congress so to do.

3. Resolved, That having taken into consideration the treaty of purchase between the United States and the Emperor of Russia, communicated by the President, in the opinion of the House it is expedient to pass the laws necessary to carry the treaty into effect.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the resolutions.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask, then, that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay the resolutions on the table.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions are not yet before the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have no objection to the resolutions being received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

There being no objection, the preamble and resolutions were received, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were reported; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 473) for the relief of Charles E. Capehart; when the Speaker signed the same.

CHARLES O. M'CREARY.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1097) for the relief of Charles O. McCreary; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

SAN FRANCISCO AND HUMBOLDT BAY RAILROAD.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1098) to aid the San Francisco and Humboldt Bay Railroad Company in the construction of a railroad from San Francisco to the town of Humboldt Bay, in the State of California, and to secure to the Government of the United States the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the various votes of reference; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS H. DIXON.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of Paymaster Thomas H. Dixon, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I would inquire the reason of that motion?

Mr. O'NEILL. It is a bill for the relief of a paymaster of the Navy, and comes properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and not the jurisdiction of the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I do not know that the Committee of Claims have any objection to that reference. But there are now pending before the Committee of Claims several claims of this nature, relating not only to paymasters of the Navy, but to paymasters of the Army.

Mr. O'NEILL. I make this motion because there are several bills of a similar character before the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I have no objection.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. O'NEILL. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

LADIES' MOUNT VERNON ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that change of reference will not be made. I ask that the memorial be read before the House acts upon the motion.

The Clerk read the memorial, as follows:

Memorial of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association of the Union.

The undersigned, ladies appointed as a committee by the Grand Council of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association, held on the 3d of December last, to present to your honorable body a claim for compensation on account of losses sustained by reason of the stoppage, during the war, of the boat plying between Washington and Mount Vernon, would respectfully urge that its loss of income derived from the boat forced the association to call in and expend all their available investments and to incur debt beside, in order to maintain Mount Vernon during the war, and that at present their treasury is empty, and that it is only by obtaining further credit that the place is now sustained.

They would also respectfully state that the home and last resting-place of the Father of his Country was secured from the hands of speculators by the exertions of women from all sections of the Union, and they now appeal confidently in the name of your countrywomen to your sympathies and sense of the justice of their claims, feeling that the appropriation of means to contribute to the preservation of "our country's shrine" would proceed appropriately from the honorable body which represents this Union.

They respectfully state that Mount Vernon was secured by the ladies of the Mount Vernon Association after the patient labor of seven years.

They hold it now as a resort for our countrymen and the patriots of the whole world.

During the desolating war which has passed they guarded it in peace and security, and they would not now be suppliants to your honorable body but for the heavy losses sustained by the interruption, during that period, of the tide of travel to it, from which they derived the means to keep the place.

Military necessity, no doubt, made this restriction imperative; but it was peculiarly unfortunate to the association, for the soldiers and others who thronged the city of Washington at that time would, in addition to its usual number of visitors, have greatly increased the revenue of Mount Vernon and placed the association in a position to make good their pledge to the public: "To keep and to guard the home of Washington as he left it," until the return of an auspicious period for renewing their labors and securing an invested fund to place their sacred charge beyond all future contingencies. But in their present necessities the committee of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association of the Union are led to make this appeal to your honorable body, confident that you will regard their claim for indemnity as valid as any that have been hitherto submitted to you and received your favorable consideration.

Your memorialists would represent that the loss inflicted on the Mount Vernon Association of the Union by the causes herein enumerated amounted to $9,000, and they respectfully urge that that sum be appropriated for their relief.

Mrs. SWEAT,
Vice Regent for Maine.
Mrs. BROOKS,
Vice Regent for New York.
Mrs. MORSE,
Vice Regent for Louisiana.

WASHINGTON CITY, May 12, 1863.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am sorry the Committee on Appropriations has felt it its duty to ask the House to relieve them from the further consideration of this memorial and to refer it to the Committee of Claims. I had hoped the House would be ready to act at once upon a matter which so commends itself to the consideration and favor of us all, and which asks for so little in reference to the objects which are contemplated by the memorial. I am of the opinion that usually everything of this kind, everything of any kind where a claim is set up against the Treasury, ought to be investigated by the proper tribunal, the Committee of Claims. But in reference to all such things there are exceptional cases, and it seems to me this is one of them. Here is a matter which lies immediately under our own observation. We all know that the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union, some ten or twelve years ago, united together, had themselves incorporated, elected vice regents, as they are termed, from their number, to aid the regent as the chief of the association, these vice regents being one from each State of the Union. And they collected from the patriotic people of this country money enough to buy Mount Vernon from its then owner, one of the Washingtons, and to secure it forever as a place of public resort to the people of the United States and the people of the world. They paid for it, I think, some two hundred thousand dollars. The condition of the conveyance was such that if it should ever cease to be kept up as such place of public resort it should revert to the State of Virginia.

Under these circumstances, having obtained possession of the property, put it in repair, provided for a custodian to be there all the time, and established a boat to run between Washington and Mount Vernon, making daily trips for the convenience of those who desire to visit a spot so sacred, they were going on prosperously until interrupted by the war. Everybody, at least in this vicinity, knows the great injury to the interests of the association. Besides those general inconveniences arising from being cut off from communication between Washington and Mount Vernon from the general progress of the war, they had special damage from the fact that their boat, upon which they relied entirely for an income, was necessarily stopped running by order of the War Department for a succession of years.

Now, what they ask is that, to enable them to go on in the execution of this interesting and sacred trust which they have undertaken, we shall make up to them in some degree at least the loss sustained by them in consequence of the stopping of the passenger boat upon which they relied for the means of keeping up that property in good condition. I think while that unfinished mass of marble and granite stands at the other end of the city as a witness against the people of the United States and their Congress, for want of due respect to the memory of Washington, it is little enough for us to make some small appropriation to keep up at least an interest in that which was his home during his life-time, and to which pilgrimages are being made by all patriotic citizens of the United States from every quarter and by all patriots and lovers of republican liberty from every part of the world. I would much rather see a bill passed at once in compliance with this request and from the sense which the House entertains of the propriety of the measure, than to keep these ladies waiting with their claim, to be bandied between any two or three of the committees of this House.

I do not criticize the action of the Committee on Appropriations, because I admit that, regularly and appropriately, the memorial should go to the Committee of Claims. But I submit to the House the question whether it would not be a graceful and proper thing, and one which would meet the approval of all our constituencies, if we should meet the claim at once by granting it?

While the Clerk has been reading the memorial I have endeavored to prepare a bill in such a shape as I would prefer. I ask the House to listen to the reading of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, and then to give unanimous consent that we may take it up and act upon it now.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill for the relief of the Mount Vernon Association.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $7,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the relief of the Mount Vernon Association.

Mr. PRUYN. Let me suggest that the bill just read does not state correctly the title of the association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the bill just read for consideration at the present time?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] whether the sum named in the bill is the sum stated in the memorial?

Mr. SCHENCK. No; these ladies in their memorial ask for $9,000; but, after looking over their memorial and some letters in my possession and ascertaining the exact time during which the boat was stopped, I have come to the conclusion that $7,000 is about right.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think $9,000 is a very reasonable amount.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no particular objection to that amount, and am willing that an amendment shall be offered to increase the sum named in the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw the motion to discharge the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I believe there is no objection to considering at the present time the bill presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] objects.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move, then, to suspend the rules, to allow me to introduce the bill for consideration at the present time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will make the amount $9,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will allow an amendment to be offered to increase the amount to $9,000.

On the motion to suspend the rules there were—ayes fifty, noes not counted.

Mr. BROOKS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROOKS and Mr. HARDING were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-four.

The SPEAKER. Not two thirds of a quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 38, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Bailey, Beatty, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferry, Garfield, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Halsey, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kerr, Knott, Koonz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Maynard, McCormick, Morgan, Morrell, Newcomb, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Polesley, Pruyn, Raum, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Sigreaves, Stewart, Taffe, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Windom, and Woodward—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Harding, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, William Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, McClurg, Mercer, Pike, Robertson, Sawyer, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and William B. Washburn—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Ela, Finney, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jencks, Judd, Kitchen, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Nunn, Peters, Phelps, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, John Trimble, Twiehell, Van Aernam, Van Aiken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—94.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative to make a quorum; but, two thirds not having voted in the affirmative, the rules are not suspended.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask to be excused from service on the committee of investigation announced to-day by the Speaker.

It was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. BURR to fill the vacancy.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868; and

An act (H. R. No. 1062) to grant the right of way to the Whitehall and Plattsburg Railroad Company.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels it to be his duty to state for the information of the House that the Senate have passed the resolution for adjournment over with an amendment.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the resolution of the House to adjourn over, with an amendment, that when the two Houses adjourn to-day they adjourn to meet on Monday, the 25th instant.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes thirty-eight, noes not counted.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no! Do not adjourn. The managers have a report to make.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Very well; I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. WARD. I call for the regular order.

Several members called for the vote on the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House for the adjournment over.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to state the reason why the House should not concur in that resolution. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that in the investigation with which the managers are charged it may be necessary, and is now necessary, to have the action of the House to compel the attendance of witnesses.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it in order to discuss the motion to adjourn over?

The SPEAKER. The question is open to debate, but to a very limited degree. It is in order for the gentleman from Massachusetts to state, as one of the managers of the impeachment, why the House should not concur in the amendment of the Senate. It is within the proper range of debate to state what public business requires our attendance here.

Mr. BUTLER. I will endeavor to proceed in order. It is quite necessary that the House should be in session to enforce its process. There have been, I have authority to say, acts of recusancy on the part of witnesses that came very near making it necessary that they should be brought before the House, and there is on the part of one or more witnesses such a desire manifested to escape all investigation that I think it will be necessary to have the House in session. I am now instructed by the managers to report a resolution for the purpose of bringing a witness who has refused to—

Mr. ROBINSON. I raise a point of order, and I leave it to the Chair entirely. I object to all this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is himself out of order, for the ruling of the Chair stands as the judgment of the House unless it is appealed from. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has not transgressed the rules; he has limited himself to a statement of the reasons why the House should not remain in session.

Mr. ROBINSON. A point of order, then, and I have done. The gentleman has already indicated that he wishes to present another resolution pending the resolution under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled that that was not in order at the present time, because the House is now considering the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire, within the most limited range, to give the reasons why the House should not adjourn over. It was telegraphed all over the country, as the conclusion of the Senate on Saturday, that no recess should be taken. To my personal knowledge more than one member, and the presumption is that a great many members, are on their way hither on the presumption that there is to be a continued session of Congress.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, sir, I think almost all gentlemen intending to go have already gone. Certainly the great bugaboo, the Chicago convention, which was to have called away so many members, in the apprehension of our friends on the other side, has taken away all that are likely to go. There is to be no further draft in that direction. We have had a quorum in the House to-day, and we shall have a larger number present to-morrow and the next day, and in my judgment it will be a very poor trade to give up a cool fortnight in May for one in the dog-days in August. I think it would be very unwise to make that trade. Committees are ready to report, and the call is going on regularly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Why did not the gentlemen have their convention in dog-days, so as to save the time now?

Mr. BLAINE. We did not want to run in competition with your convention in the dog-days.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not know about that.

Mr. ROSS. It is apparent to me, Mr. Speaker, that there will be nothing done, and as an outside consideration I will state that there is an important convention now being held in Chicago, and there is great danger of its being broken up or disrupted unless we go and look after it. I think, therefore, it is our duty to go en masse as a body to Chicago and see if we cannot heal the breach that is apparently overshadowing the great national party of this country. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELSEY. I demand the previous question on concurring in the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 62, noes 33.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative, making a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the resolution and amendment were laid on the table.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. BUTLER. On behalf of the managers on the part of the House on the impeachment I offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas a summons was heretofore in due form issued by the committee of managers under the authority of the resolution of the House, directed to Charles Woolley, in the words and figures following, that is to say:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America.

To NEEHEMIAH G. ORDWAY, Esq., Sergeant-at-Arms, or his special messenger:

You are hereby commanded to summon Charles Woolley, of Cincinnati, to be and appear before the managers on the part of the House of Representatives of the United States, of whom the Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM is chairman, to conduct the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in their Chamber, in the city of Washington, on Monday, May 18, instant, at the hour of eleven o'clock and thirty minutes a. m., then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said managers, and he is not to depart without leave of said managers.

Herein fail not, and make return of this summons. Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 17th day of May, 1868. JOHN A. BINGHAM, Chairman.

Attest: B. D. WILTNEY, Clerk, commanding said Woolley to appear at the time and place therein named, in obedience to the order of the House, which summons was duly served upon said Woolley, in the city of Washington, on the 17th day of May instant, as appears by the return of the deputy sergeant-at-arms thereof, in the words and figures following, that is to say:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1868.

I certify that, by direction of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the United States House of Representatives, I have this day, about the hour of four o'clock in the afternoon, at Willard's Hotel, in the city of Washington, given in hand to the within Charles Woolley a true and attested copy of this subpoena.

M. H. ALBERGER, Special Messenger.

yet the said Woolley, well knowing the premises and in contempt of the powers of the House and its authority, neglects and refuses to appear in obedience thereto, and eluded himself and left the city of Washington in avoidance of the same and in contempt of the authority of the House and its process: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a warrant under the hand of the Speaker be issued in due form commanding the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest said Woolley and bring him to the bar of the House, to answer for his contempt of authority, and to be further dealt with as the House may order.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the date of the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The CLERK. The 17th.

Mr. ROBINSON. Sunday!

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. My question of order is that the House is called upon by this resolution by extraordinary process of attachment to bring this witness before the bar of the House, for contempt of the authority of the House, when in fact the resolution shows upon its face that no valid subpoena has ever been served upon the witness, for a subpoena can only issue by authority of the House of Representatives, signed by the Speaker of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana. By the rule, which will be found on page 191 of the Digest, "All subpoenas issued by order of the House shall be under the hand and seal of the Speaker, attested by the Clerk." The resolution is still before the House, however, and the House can take any action in regard to it that they may determine on. It is for the House to decide questions of contempt of its own rules. In the opinion of the Chair all subpoenas, to be legal, so that you can bring a person to the bar of the House for contempt in refusing to obey them, have, according to the uniform usage of the House in its whole history, to be signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk. This subpoena appears to have been signed by the chairman of the managers and attested by their clerk. It is, however, for the House to determine the authority they have given the managers, and whether it differs from the authority given to previous committees to send for persons and papers. The House have certainly a right to pass any resolution they please in regard to the matter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It appears also on the face of the resolution that the subpoena was not valid because of the fact that it was served on Sunday.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine.

Mr. BUTLER. I call the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. COVODE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me to make a statement?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COVODE. I desire to state what has been the practice of this House and its committees for the last twelve years, and I believe the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] voted to aid in inaugurating the practice. When Mr. Orr, of South Carolina, was engaged in investigating the supposed corrupt practices that were carried on in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, the House gave the committee, of which he was chairman, authority to subpoena witnesses. Under that authority the committee carried on an investigation and subpoenaed hundreds of witnesses and never asked the Speaker to sign one of the subpoenas until they were compelled to come into the House to ask the authority of the House to bring witnesses under arrest. And from that day to this I have never known a single instance—and I have been engaged on different investigating committees—where the chairman of the committee has not been allowed to issue subpoenas, only coming into the House when a contumacious witness refused to answer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the Clerk reads three paragraphs from page 191 of the Digest. The gentleman from Pennsylvania may not have complied with the rules of the House, and he states that he has not, but the Digest will settle the question:

"Witnesses are summoned in pursuance of an order of the House, usually by virtue of its authority conferred upon a committee 'to send for persons and papers.'"

"All subpoenas issued by order of the House shall be under the hand and seal of the Speaker, attested by the Clerk."

"The Sergeant-at-Arms shall execute the commands of the House from time to time, together with all such process issued by authority thereof as shall be directed to him by the Speaker."

Mr. COVODE. It so happens, then, that this is a new enforcement of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that the point has ever before been raised. But he has no doubt that, had it been raised, it would have been ruled as the Chair now rules.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask of the Chair a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor, and cannot be taken from it except by a point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think my question involves a point of order. I desire to ask what is the ruling of the Chair in sustaining the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN]? I understood the point raised by the gentleman to be that the subpoena was void, and that the witness could not be in contempt of the House; and I understood the Chair to sustain the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled that the eighth and twenty-second rules of the House, and the decision of the House upon those rules, as found in the Digest, require subpoenas ordered by the House to be signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk. But the Chair stated that the House has the power, as a matter of course, to construe its own rules, in cases of alleged contempts, without any arbitrary power on the part of the Speaker to prevent it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. BUTLER. I have not had a chance to say anything myself yet. The House, by a resolution, gave the managers power to send for persons and papers, and directed them, as a committee, to make an investigation. Following what was understood to be the practice, the committee sent out their subpoena, that subpoena being signed by the chairman of the committee. That, I am informed, is the practice of the House, a practice of many years' standing. This witness, Woolley, has refused to obey the subpoena, for the reason that the House had no power to have a summons served on Sunday. He grew suddenly religious, and thereupon notified the deputy Sergeant-at-Arms that he would wait until this morning, if the House wanted anything of him. But, instead of doing so, he left the city on the train last night for New York, as we are informed by a telegram from New York. Now, I suppose it is in the power of the House to pass a resolution to send for any person at any time without any preliminary subpoena. If the subpoena of the committee was not a good one, or if it could not be served on Sunday, that may be a good reason why the House will not punish Mr. Woolley when he comes here, and a good reason why he should not be mulcted in costs or any other punishment, provided he stayed away for that reason. But if he stayed away for any other reason it was a contempt of the authority of the House, just as much as though he had had a good summons. We have a right to send for him in any form. But the House would have said to us, Why not notify him before you call upon us to act? We have notified him, and he objected because it was Sunday. Now, let me say that I do not know any law, parliamentary or ordinary, which forbids this House exercising its powers and duties on Sunday when the necessities of the case require it. If anybody does I should like to see the law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute on that subject?

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would inquire of the Speaker if it is in order for me now, as a privileged question, to move that the managers be censured by this House for their open violation of the Sabbath in this city without any necessity?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. A resolution of censure cannot now interrupt the action of the House upon this matter, unless it should be to censure a member for words uttered in debate upon this resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought it would be in order to do so now; for this is a terrible and open violation of the Sabbath by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] utterly inconsistent with Puritanism.

Mr. COVODE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. I will, certainly.

Mr. COVODE. There is one point which I neglected to mention. During the time I was engaged in what was called the "Covode investigation" I had occasion to subpoena members of Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet. Among the rest I subpoenaed his Attorney General, Mr. Black. They all came before the committee, and never thought of protesting against my authority to summon them.

I will also state that in the case of the committee on the conduct of the war, a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, in no single instance did we ever send a subpoena signed by any other person than the chairman of that committee. I think gentlemen on the other side might well act upon the course pursued by their Attorney General, who did not even enter a protest against the action of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. My point of order is that the gentleman is attempting to controvert and overrule the decision of the Chair, and is not treating the Chair with proper respect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is able to protect his own rights.

Mr. ROBINSON. But can I not make a suggestion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, when on the floor before, stated the usage of a committee of which he was formerly a member. The Chair remarked that he had no doubt that if the point had been made at that time the ruling of the Speaker would have been the same as the ruling of the Chair to-day. The gentleman is now referring to the case of a joint committee—an entirely different question.

Mr. ROBINSON. My point of order is this: after the Speaker has decided a question, ruling it over and over again, is it in order for any gentleman to discuss and attempt to controvert that decision?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very glad to find the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] objecting to gentlemen doubting the decision of the Chair. [Laughter.] The Chair will state, by way of explanation, that he did not rule out the resolution. He stated that, in his opinion, such a subpoena as that recited in the resolution was not in accordance with the rules of the House; but he also remarked that it is for the House to construe its own rules, and, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has argued, the House can determine upon whatever action it may deem proper.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it not the proper course for any gentleman who doubts the decision of the Chair to take an appeal?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the resolution is in order, being presented by the managers, who have authority to report at any time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not objecting to the resolution. I am objecting to gentlemen arguing—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. He has raised a point of order, which has been overruled.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to propound an inquiry to the Chair; for this matter raises what is a new question to me, if not to the House. What means the authority given to a committee "to send for persons and papers" if the subpoenas must after all be issued by the authority of the House, through the officers of the House? In other words, cannot the House give to a committee authority "to send for persons and papers?" and if such authority be given, and the committee sends for a person, is it not contempt of the authority of the House for that person to refuse to appear?

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine; but the Chair, in answer to the parliamentary inquiry, will say that the Speaker of the House and the Clerk of the House sign no subpoena except where a committee has been authorized to send for persons and papers. It has been the ordinary practice of Speakers—certainly of the present occupant of the chair—to sign subpoenas in blank for the use of committees that have received such authority. Sometimes he has signed them by the hundreds when committees have been about to go to the southern States, so that, under the signature of the Speaker, they might execute the authority of the House. The rule on this subject is laid down as follows in the Digest, under the head of "Witness:"

"Witnesses are summoned in pursuance of an order of the House, usually by virtue of its authority conferred upon a committee 'to send for persons and papers.'"—Journal, 1, 35, pp. 88, 175.

All subpoenas issued by order of the House shall be under the hand and seal of the Speaker, attested by the Clerk."—Rule 8.

"The Sergeant-at-Arms shall execute the commands of the House from time to time, together with all such process issued by authority thereof as shall be directed to him by the Speaker."—Rule 22.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope that settles the question.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EGGLESTON.]

Mr. EGGLESTON. Mr. Speaker, as the witness whom it is now proposed to pursue is one of my constituents, I suppose I ought to make an apology for not defending him; but after hearing the excuses which have been made on the other side—one that the subpoena was served on the Sabbath, and the other that the witness had important business in New York—I simply desire to say that I have no apology to offer for him. I hope he will, by some process, be brought before the board of managers and compelled to divulge all he knows with reference to the matter under investigation.

Mr. BUTLER. In order to obviate all difficulty in regard to this question I modify the resolution by striking out so much as asserts that Woolley is in contempt of the House, so that the resolution will then simply order the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring him here forthwith.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it proposed to arrest a citizen who is not charged with any contempt of the House?

Mr. BUTLER. We omit the clause charging him with contempt of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I raise the question of order that this House has no power to send for a person without some process, and that we cannot issue a warrant to arrest a party and bring him before the House unless he is in contempt of the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order upon the ground that the Speaker is not required to decide such questions. They are for the House to determine. The Clerk will read the rule as laid down on page 104 of Jefferson's Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Were he permitted to draw questions of consequence within the vortex of order he might usurp a negative on important modifications, and suppress instead of subserving the legislative will."

The SPEAKER. The point suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin is in the nature of argument, and is not a point of order.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me.

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot yield further.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a statement in regard to Mr. Woolley. I understand that Mr. Woolley is at Willard's Hotel; that he went last evening to Baltimore and returned this morning.

Mr. ROBINSON. And Mr. Woolley knows nothing why they are after him.

Mr. BUTLER. How does the gentleman from Brooklyn know that?

Mr. ROBINSON. When I am subpoenaed I will answer. I am prepared to meet the gentleman here or in the Lowell railroad depot. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to hear the statement of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STEWART. I was informed within three minutes, by a gentleman in whom I have every confidence, that Mr. Woolley is at Willard's Hotel, and that he has no idea of disobeying the subpoena issued by the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. He left in the train last night and went to New York.

Mr. STEWART. No, sir; only to Baltimore, and he returned this morning. He stated to the gentleman who served the subpoena that he would be at the service of the committee whenever they informed him he was needed. He intended to go to New York, but changed his mind and went to Baltimore. He is in this city now.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. This discussion is all unnecessary, and the better way is to vote. I hope my colleague will call for the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER. On the assurance of the gentleman from New York [Mr. STEWART] that Mr. Woolley is here intending to respond to the subpoena, I will withdraw the resolution for the present.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House joint resolution No. 91, concerning certain lands granted to railroad companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin; when the Speaker signed the same.

ADJOURNMENT OVER—AGAIN.

Mr. PILE. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the subject of adjournment over was laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion has already been made and laid on the table.

Mr. PILE. The Senate is waiting for our action, and they ought to be notified of it.

The SPEAKER. It is not usual to notify the other House of the action of the House in laying a subject on the table, but as the Senate are waiting for our action the Chair will have them notified.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to suspend the rules in order to take the resolution from the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. PIKE, (at four o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of E. G. Merrick, W. H. Sprague, and 50 others, of Detroit, praying Congress for an appropriation to deepen the Sault Ste. Marie river and ship-canal, so as to admit of the passage of the largest class of vessels from Lake Huron to Lake Superior.

By Mr. FERRISS: The petition of John Plankey, for an additional sum of twenty-five dollars to aid him in purchasing an improved artificial arm.

By Mr. INGERSOLL: A memorial of the Universal Franchise Association of the District of Columbia, asking the enfranchisement of women in the District.

By Mr. KERR: The application of John L. Menangle and others, for a new post route in Washington county, Indiana.

By Mr. PAINE: The petition of William H. Pettit and 130 others, citizens of Kenosha, Wisconsin, for an appropriation for the harbor of Kenosha.

By Mr. SCHENCK: A memorial of Malcolm Seaton, administrator of the estate of the late W. W. Seaton, for claim on account of one hundred copies of the annals and debates of Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 19, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent of the House to make an explanation which will require but a few moments.

The SPEAKER. For what length of time?

Mr. MORGAN. From three to five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the morning hour commence and I have no objection. I desire to get into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take up the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, then, objects, and the morning hour has commenced. Reports from the Committee of Claims are in order. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] yield to the gentleman from Ohio for five minutes?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. If the committee do not take up the whole of the morning hour I will then yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MORGAN.] I now yield to my colleague on the committee.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HARDING, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely on the following cases, and the same were laid on the table:

The petition of Mrs. Joseph Gales, of the District of Columbia, praying restoration of or compensation for certain fencing on her property, destroyed by United States soldiers in 1861;

The petition of Roxanna Evans;

The petition of James E. Wharton, of Parkersburg, West Virginia, asking compensation for damages sustained by him in the destruction of his property by United States troops in July, 1864; and

The claim of Little B. Madding, for property lost in the rebellion.

WAIT TALCOTT.

Mr. HARDING also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1099) for the relief of Wait Talcott; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to the claimant, an internal revenue collector of the second district of Illinois, of the 18th of February, 1865, $556 93, in consideration of the loss of that sum by the robbing of that amount from his deputy, Captain Richard A. Smith.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DONNELLY AND COMPANY.

Mr. HARDING also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the motion in behalf of Donnelly & Co., of Wilmington, North Carolina, asking compensation for liquors furnished to the United States hospital.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to state that I was not aware of this adverse report being made. There are certain additional papers presented in the case which I forgot to lay before the committee, and I therefore ask to have the memorial recommitted to the committee.

The report was accordingly withdrawn and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES BUTTERFIELD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely on House bill No. 402, for the relief of Charles Butterfield, a Chippewa half-breed Indian; and the same was laid on the table.

BENJAMIN GRATZ.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the memorial of Benjamin Gratz, praying compensation for property taken by the Army and burned while in its possession; and the same was laid on the table.

HEIRS OF GIDEON WALKER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the same committee, reported adversely on House bill No. 477, for the relief of the heirs of Gideon Walker, of Indiana.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me about ten minutes on this case?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Not to exceed ten minutes.

Mr. HUNTER. I object to the report of the committee in this case, and I desire to present some reasons why it should not be adopted. This claim, as I understand it, is founded on the following state of facts: Mr. Walker, in 1792, was enlisted as a soldier of the United States to serve for the period of three years. In August following he was mustered into the United States service. Some two or three days afterward he was placed on detached service, and drew from the Government six months' clothing and some eight months' rations. He was away from his command during the entire time of the three years' service. During that time he never was mustered for pay, and never received from the Government a single cent of pay in any way for all the service he rendered. When his time of service expired, not being with his command, he was mustered out of service. His discharge was delivered to him by his captain with a promise from the captain that, as there was no paymaster there to pay him, in a short time after that he, the captain, would go to the capital of the nation for the purpose of settling his own accounts, and he would then see that Mr. Walker should receive his pay. Relying upon that promise, and supposing as a matter of course that it would all be right, he did not give it the attention that he otherwise would have done. A short time after that his captain removed to parts unknown, and supposing that the evidence of his captain was necessary, he let his claim lay until he could ascertain his whereabouts. In the mean time he removed to Indiana and settled in the county where I now reside. After waiting a number of years to hear from his captain he appealed to Congress to have his claim allowed. It has been reported upon favorably, I believe, by two committees of this House, and passed the House quite a number of years ago, but failed to pass the Senate because there was no one there to look after it.

Now, I understand from the committee that there is really no objection to this claim, except that it is a stale one, and that the records of the United States having been burned many years ago the Government now has nothing to show the condition of this claim, except a record containing a list of all soldiers that did not receive their pay, and Mr. Walker's name not being on that list they take it for granted that he or some one for him received his pay. Now, in answer to that, Mr. Walker stated that the reason his name was not on the pay-roll was that he never was mustered for or received any pay during the time he was in the service and his name never was placed on any pay-roll, and this statement fully explained to the satisfaction of the committees who have reported favorably upon this claim heretofore the reason that his name did not appear upon that record.

Now, I desire to say to the House that I knew Mr. Walker well, and knew him to be a gentleman who would not tell a lie, let alone swear to one, for the purpose of recovering money from the Government or from any individual; and when Mr. Walker has stated that he never received from the United States Government a single cent of pay as a soldier for the three years that he served, from 1792 to 1795, I believe the statement and know that it is true; and I do hope this House will not adopt the report of the committee and refuse to pay this claim because it appears to be a stale one and the probability might be that some other person received the money on it instead of Mr. Walker.

One of my colleagues, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who is a member of the Committee of Claims, knows some of the witnesses in this case, who testify as to the character and standing of Mr. Walker, and knows them to be gentlemen of the greatest integrity.

Now, a man whose character is above reproach, and who served the Government and proves his service, and then makes oath that he never received from the Government a single cent for that service, unless the Government has some record showing that he has been paid, it seems to me that the Government ought not to refuse to allow and pay his claim.

Mr. Walker tried for some thirty years to get his claim from the Government, but failed because, like all claims of this character, it has been kept in the hands of the committee until it was too late to pass through Congress. I do hope, now that he is dead and gone, that at this late day the Congress of the United States will not refuse to pay the heirs of this man for services rendered many years ago, and for which he nor they have ever received one cent.

I am as thoroughly satisfied that Mr. Walker never received one cent for the services embraced within this bill as I am that I am now addressing this body, and being so convinced, I appeal to members to pass this bill, and thereby extend to these heirs that justice which was so long denied their father.

I desire now to hear from the committee, and if there are any valid objections raised to this claim I will ask two or three minutes to reply to those objections.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. For what purpose?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. For a motion to refer this claim to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield for that purpose. This claim is an old customer, and has been before the Committee of Claims for some fifty years; and the Committees of Claims of different Congresses for more than fifty years having had charge of this claim and acted upon it I do not think it is now necessary to take it from that committee, to which it properly belongs, and refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, which has properly no jurisdiction over it. I wish to call the attention of the House to a peculiarity of this claim. It seems that no claim against the Government of the United States is ever outlawed. Here is a claim for services from the years 1792 to 1795, upon which the Committee of Claims now make an adverse report. This claim has been pressed for the last fifty years before different Congresses, and never yet has succeeded in passing through Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I will state what I suppose the gentleman wishes to state. There have been one or two times when the House Committee of Claims have made a favorable report upon this claim, and I believe that favorable report has been adopted by the House, but it has never yet passed the Senate. One of the peculiarities of this case is this: Mr. Walker served in the Army, as he claims, for the period named; but he made no application to this Government, so far as the record shows and so far as he testifies, for any pay until after the year 1814. Now, it is very strange that no effort was made to recover his pay until after that time, until after the year 1814, after the records of the Government had been burned.

Mr. PAINE. Does it appear from his statement or affidavit that he made no application for his pay until after 1814?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. That fact appears from his own statement and affidavit; he states that he did not present any claim until after the year 1814.

Mr. HUNTER. State the reason why.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The case was not presented until after the burning of the public buildings by the enemy in 1814, prior to which time access could have been had to the rolls of the paymaster's department, by which all the facts could have been ascertained. But after those papers were destroyed it was not possible for the department to ascertain the facts in regard to the claim from those papers. But the books were preserved upon which were entered all the names of those who served at that period, but who had not been paid by the paymaster. That book did not contain the name of Gideon Walker, showing conclusively to the accounting officer that if Mr. Walker had not been paid, as he claimed, his name would appear upon this book. I wish to state here, so that no discredit may attach to Mr. Walker, that he might have been perfectly honest in his claim, and still his pay might have been drawn on an order given by him on some previous occasion, while he himself did not receive it personally.

Now, I do not wish to take up much time with this case, because the House will understand that the claim extends back for seventy-eight years, that the records are burned, and that the claimant died years ago. Now, is it necessary for us to go back, under all the doubts and difficulties connected with this case, and revive it to make a favorable report? I will ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Third Auditor to a former Committee of Claims upon this case, which, I think, settles the matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE, December 20, 1845.

SIR: With regard to the case of Gideon Walker, whose papers you left with me on the 12th instant, and who claims pay for services rendered in Captain Spark's company of riflemen, from 1792 to 1795, I have the honor to inform you that the subject of his claim has, upon the depositions of W. C. Foster and Abram Buskirk, now produced, been reexamined. These depositions only set forth the facts connected with the services, &c., of Mr. Walker, as have been related to the deponents by himself, and cannot, in my opinion, be considered sufficient to remove the objections heretofore made to an allowance of his claim. With respect to that part of my letter to you of the 29th January last, which you underscore, and call my attention to the words, I have to state that a paymaster would as readily receive a credit for a payment to a duly authorized attorney, as he would for a payment to a soldier himself; hence the remark, "if not paid to himself, as he alleges, it has been paid to some one on his authority." The books of balances due to dead and discharged soldiers, heretofore referred to, were prepared for the express purpose, and embrace balances due to soldiers from the year 1790 to the year 1814, inclusive; and upon the settlement of every paymaster's account, a credit alone of so much only as was paid on the rolls was allowed, and the balances remaining unpaid were immediately entered to the credit of the soldiers in those books, awaiting application therefor, when payment would be made.

The absence of the name of Gideon Walker from those books, to my mind admits of the strongest inference that he has been paid for his services, and that some paymaster, whose accounts have been destroyed in the burning of the public buildings, has received a credit for the payment, otherwise he would be returned for whatever might have been due him. Under these circumstances, therefore, I should not, without legislative interference, feel authorized to allow his claim. The papers are herewith returned.

With great respect, &c.,

PETER HAGNER, Auditor.

Hon. JOHN W. DAVIS, House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the permission of my colleague on the committee, I desire to say a word. I knew Dr. Walker by reputation for many years of his life. His integrity was unquestioned. He was a gentleman of very high character, as has been stated by my colleague from that district, [Mr. HUNTER.] In acting upon this case the committee, I believe, has been influenced not only by the principles laid down in the letter which has just been read, but also by the fact that of late years it has not been customary for Congress to grant relief in such cases, because their antiquity renders it almost an utter impossibility to get a knowledge of the true state of the case, and because of the danger of establishing precedents for such allowances after such an extraordinary lapse of time, especially where a claim is not presented to Congress for consideration until many years after the claim against the Government has accrued. In this case the claim accrued in 1795 and was not presented till 1814. The committee, in rejecting this claim, acted, I believe, upon the principle that it must be fairly presumed after such a lapse of time that the claim has been adjusted, not from any doubt of the integrity of Dr. Walker.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to occupy any more of the time of the House. I think the case is fully understood.

Mr. PAINE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I will do so.

Mr. PAINE. I have no knowledge of this case; but upon examining the authority just read at the Clerk's desk I think I can see a possibility, if not a probability, that this gentleman may not after all have been paid; for, as I understand that letter written by the Third Auditor, this book was made up in this way: when paymasters' accounts were presented unpaid balances were carried into this book to the credit of the soldiers who were not fully paid. Now, if a soldier happened to be detached from his company or regiment, he would not, under the system of payment then in vogue, be entered upon the roll of any paymaster who may have paid the regiment or company to which he belonged. It was very natural that his name should not be found on this book, because, according to the showing of the Third Auditor, there is no reason why it should be. He not being on the roll of the paymaster who paid the company, there would be no balance in his favor to be transferred to that book. If he was at that time detached from his company, I do not see how his name could appear on that book, if the book was prepared as the letter of the Third Auditor would indicate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. But he says he received six months' pay and rations. That should appear.

Mr. PAINE. As I understand, that was paid him during the time he was ordered upon detached service, so that, of course, there would be no entry of that on any paymaster's roll. If the paymaster was called upon to pay a company with which he was not serving, his name would not appear on the pay-roll.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. But the names of the company appear on the papers, and the names of those who were not paid were transferred to this book; and the name of every other individual who has claimed pay, except Mr. Gideon Walker, appears on this book. Now, the difficulty is this: the rolls which contained his name and the other papers which would furnish evidence of payment were all burned; and though he may have been paid it cannot be shown from the fact that the records were destroyed prior to any application being made. The application might have been made prior to that time and the money paid. Mr. Walker, however, says that he did not make any application, and he now applies for his pay. The presumption is, that as his name does not appear on the record which gives an account of the different men in said company who had not been paid, his name was upon the roll, and if it had been he would have been paid previous to the destruction of these papers. Under all these circumstances and with all these doubts the committee were clearly of opinion, a delay having taken place for so many years, and as the presumption was strongly against it, that we should not report a bill favorable to a claim of this kind seventy-eight years afterward.

Mr. HUNTER rose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I have given to almost the whole of the Indiana delegation an opportunity to put themselves upon the record in favor of this good old gentleman, and now, as we have just commenced our reports, I must call for the previous question.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to explain how it is possible his name may not have been put upon the muster-roll.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I yield for a moment.

Mr. HUNTER. When a man is placed upon detached service it is of frequent occurrence that he is not mustered when the others are mustered for pay, and in that way his name may have been dropped from the roll. He explains and shows that he was never with his company, and that he was placed upon detached service three days after he was mustered into the service of the United States. His name was upon the pay-roll, but he never did receive a cent. And the point now is this: whether this House will not take the sworn statement of an honest man and allow him what is due to him instead of defeating the claim by an inference that he was paid, and that if he was not paid it was paid to somebody else.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. When an individual's name gets upon the roll it does not get off, and the only difficulty is that the roll has been burnt up and we are not able to produce the roll. That being the fact, I do not think it should be binding upon the Government.

The report was laid upon the table.

STEAMBOAT CHAMPION NO. 3.

Mr. MERCUR, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the memorial of the officers and crew of the steamboat Champion No. 3, for compensation while prisoners of war; which was laid on the table.

PALEMON JOHN.

Mr. MERCUR, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 433, for the relief of Palemon John, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill directs the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to allow Palemon John a credit for some seven hundred and sixty-nine dollars and thirty-seven cents for that amount of revenue stamps lost or stolen from the mail while the same were in transition to said commissioner from Palemon John, late a stamp agent.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Is there any report?

Mr. MERCUR. There is, and I ask that it be read.

The report of the committee was read in extenso, from which it appears that Palemon John in 1866 was an assessor of internal revenue for the thirteenth district of Pennsylvania and acted as agent for the sale of revenue stamps. Soon after the termination of his office as assessor the Commissioner of Internal Revenue notified him that his agency for the sale of stamps necessarily ceased under law, and requested him to return to the office any balance of stamps. At that time Mr. John had $769 33 worth of stamps of different denominations, which on the 7th of December, 1866, he deposited in the post office in a package addressed to Hon. E. A. Rollins. It was fully proved that the package was lost or stolen, and that Mr. John had acted honestly.

Mr. MERCUR. If gentlemen have no further questions to ask I will call for the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Is there any regulation of the internal revenue department authorizing these stamps to be sent by mail?

Mr. MERCUR. Most of the stamps were sent by mail, but there was no fixed rule.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I undertake to say no prudent man would send by mail a package of that description. Now, if the Government chose to send out stamps in that mode, and incur the risk of loss, that was the risk of the Government; but that did not authorize this man to adopt the same mode, and in the absence of any instruction he had no right to do so. The claim, in my judgment, ought not to be paid.

Mr. MERCUR. Mr. Speaker, the stamps were at all times the property of the Government. The agents of the Government, when they sent them to him, sent them by mail. When they ordered him to return them I think he had a right to assume that they wished them sent in the same manner in which he had received them, in the absence of any intimation that they desired them sent in any other way.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] how valuable matter is to be transmitted in this country if no prudent man will intrust a package of three or four hundred dollars in value to the United States mail, even though he may take the precaution to register? What condition of things is that?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. My answer to the gentleman is this: we have abundance of express companies in this country, and every prudent man sends valuable packages by express rather than by mail. Now, we know that the Government has paid large sums of money for sending packages by express between Washington and New York. They do not send by mail because they know it is unsafe. A registered letter is simply a notice to every dishonest man in the Post Office Department that there is something valuable in it which can be stolen. No prudent man sends a registered letter, containing money or stamps unless he expects to incur the risk of loss.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire further to say that if the condition of the mail service is such as is described by the gentleman from Ohio, it is due that this Congress should give notice to the public that the Department is in the hands of thieves so palpably that the man brands himself as a fool or wanting in common prudence who trusts a valuable letter to the charge of the Post Office Department of the United States. I am not speaking of the merits of this case; but it seems to me, in this connection, that if the agent returned the property by the conveyance through which he had received it from the revenue department he ought not to be held responsible. And I aver again that, on the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, Congress should give notice that instead of the Post Office Department or the mail service of the country being reliable it is in the hands of thieves, to whom a three cent stamp may not safely be intrusted.

Mr. MERCUR. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I wish to state one fact to the House in order that there may be no misunderstanding in reference to this case. I understand the regulations of the internal revenue department now require stamps to be returned by express. We have had various applications before the committee to relieve individuals who have returned their proceeds by mail since the regulation required them to be returned by express, and we have refused to grant that relief on the ground that they have not followed the regulations of the internal revenue department. But in this case, at the time this transaction took place, there was no settled regulation by the department requiring them to be returned by express. Accordingly this individual received his stamps by mail; and being ordered to return them he sent them in the same channel by which he received them. The committee thought it was fair and equitable to this person, under those circumstances, that relief should be granted; and it was upon that basis that this bill has been reported.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: whether the internal revenue department has made any regulation in connection with the return of stamps requiring them to be returned uncanceled or undefaced, so that even if they were unstolen they would be valueless in the hands of anybody. To the Government we know these stamps are of the value of so much paper, printer's ink, and labor. By putting some mark of cancellation on them and then returning them to the Government it would discharge the agent of his liability to loss. Is there any such regulation by the department?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I do not understand that the department has any such regulation.

Mr. BLAINE. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if it is now a regulation of the internal revenue department that no valuable matter may be transmitted by mail.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. No, sir; I do not understand that; but I understand that money for the receipt of stamps they require to be sent by express, or stamps themselves.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, that is the only thing of that kind they have to transmit. It is a most extraordinary thing that one department of this Government should officially discredit to the whole country another department, and all that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says is more than justified if that be the case.

Mr. MERCUR. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire to make a single remark in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] The inference which the gentleman drew from my remarks is entirely unauthorized and unwarranted by what I said. I do not undertake to say, and I hope no gentleman will draw that inference from what I did say, that the Post Office Department is in the hands of thieves. But I do say, what every one knows, that there are men in the Post Office Department who are not honest and who will steal letters when they have money or other valuables in them. It may be that there are but few of such men; but the very fact that this package was stolen proves that there is somebody in the Department who will steal. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a lawyer and has been a judge, and able in both capacities, and will undertake to say that if a lawyer should remit money by mail without instructions from his client and it should be lost in the mail that lawyer would be relieved from responsibility to his client? Not at all, sir. Then let us apply the same rule to the agents of the Government that is applied to the agents of private individuals.

Mr. MERCUR resumed the floor.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] a question.

Mr. MERCUR. I must decline to yield further.

Mr. HIGBY. I wish only to ask one question.

Mr. MERCUR. Well, I will hear it.

Mr. HIGBY. It is, if the Government of the United States can repudiate its own carrier? That is the question I wished to ask the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MERCUR. There is no reason why the Government of the United States should steal from its citizens and then seek to hold them responsible for the loss.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MERCUR. I will yield for a single question; but it must be the last.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to know if the Government of the United States insures money and other valuables sent through the mails for all persons? If it does not, it seems to me that this officer can ask no more of the Government in carrying his package than any other persons who send their money through the mails.

Mr. MERCUR. That question hardly needs an answer. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. MERCUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT J. H. CHEESEMAN'S CREW.

Mr. MERCUR, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the memorial of the officers and men of the steamboat J. H. Cheeseman, claiming compensation for services while prisoners of war, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think we ought to hear some reasons why this claim is rejected. It does not follow because the committee thinks it deserves rejection that the House would so think. If these men were prisoners of war I do not see why they should not be paid.

Mr. MERCUR. They were officers and men on board a steamboat, and were in the employment of the captain or master of the steamboat. That steamboat was hired by the Government, and while it was in the employment and service of the Government these men were taken prisoners. Although they were never in the employment of the Government directly, never had any claim against the Government, they now ask that the Government shall pay them for that period of time during which they were held as prisoners. That is the case in a nutshell.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire if these men are entitled to compensation from any one? or were the terms of the contract which they made such as to require them to take that risk upon themselves? or was it one of those unavoidable calamities for which there is no relief?

Mr. MERCUR. They were employed by the master of the boat. What the terms of the contract were do not appear. The Government made no contract, either express or implied, with any of these officers or men.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

WILLIAM P. QUINN.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the petition of William P. Quinn; which was laid on the table.

P. H. CARDWELL.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the same committee, also reported adversely upon the memorial of

P. H. Cardwell, praying compensation for damages to property; which was laid on the table.

HENRY BARRICKLOW.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 1063, for the relief of Henry Barricklow.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. The preamble states that on the 28th of March, 1859, by the sinking of the steamboat Nat Holmes in the Ohio river, near the city of Aurora, Indiana, Henry Barricklow lost twenty-three land warrants, each for one hundred and sixty acres, and that duplicates of said warrants have been issued by the commissioner and delivered to said Barricklow.

The bill accordingly authorizes the said Henry Barricklow to locate or sell the said duplicate land warrants in the same manner as if they had been issued in his name, and directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue patents of their location as in the case of other land warrants.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Were these land warrants owned originally by different parties?

Mr. HOLMAN. They were issued originally to different parties.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. This Mr. Barricklow was the owner of them at the time they were lost?

Mr. HOLMAN. He was.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The case of Mr. Barricklow seems to be very well made out. The only objection to it, I should think, would be in the mind of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that this man was a carpet-bagger, for it appears the warrants were in a carpet bag when lost.

Mr. HOLMAN. He seems to have been a carpet-bagger; but that was before carpet-bagging became a political institution. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAFETY OF STEAMBOAT TRAVEL.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill (H. R. No. 1100) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamboats and other vessels, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

JOHN SEDGWICK.

Mr. MERCUR, from the Committee of Claims, reported back House joint resolution No. 96, for the relief of John Sedgwick, collector of internal revenue in the third district of California, together with a substitute, with a recommendation that the substitute be adopted.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute.

The substitute was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John Sedgwick, collector of internal revenue in the third district of California, the sum of $3,500, or so much thereof as the proper accounting officer shall, from satisfactory vouchers, determine to be necessary to secure to him a salary of that amount for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, in addition to the amount he necessarily paid out in currency in the discharge of his official duties for said year.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and this bill goes over till the next morning hour.

IRRIGATION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 7th instant, information furnished by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, relative to the most approved methods of irrigation of the public lands, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER,] who has been unexpectedly called away, desires indefinite leave of absence.

Leave was granted.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. WOODWARD asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence.

ADJOURNMENT TILL FRIDAY.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to offer an amendment to the motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will hear it.

Mr. THOMAS. It is to add the words, "and the Speaker shall, after the Journal has been read on Friday next, adjourn the House to meet on Monday."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] cannot be adopted without unanimous consent. The House cannot, in the opinion of the Chair, order what shall be done on Friday next, except by unanimous consent.

Several members objected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then let my motion be put in its original form.

On the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH there were—ayes 45, noes 44; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. FARNSWORTH and WARD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 45.

Mr. WARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 52, not voting 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Bromwell, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Harding, Higby, Holtman, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kelley, Knott, Lynch, Marshall, Maynard, McCormick, Morgan, Morrell, Myers, Nicholson, O'Neill, Pile, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Windom—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Blaine, Boutwell, Butler, Cobb, Coburn, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Marvin, McClurg, Mercur, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Poland, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Scofield, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffe, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, and Thomas Williams—52.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boyer, Bromall, Buckland, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Culison, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Ela, Finney, Fox, Getz, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Judd, Kerr, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Peters, Phelps, Plants, Polesley, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Welker, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—87.

So the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH was rejected.

Mr. ORTH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was rejected; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Cannot that motion be renewed?

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged motion, and can be renewed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask leave to make a statement.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will state to the gentleman that after the bill is read I will yield any time he desires.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to agree this morning that after the morning hour the gentleman from Ohio should have the floor to make his explanation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not wish to keep the gentleman from Ohio from making his explanation, but I would prefer to have it as I have suggested.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will let him make his explanation now.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. How much time does he want?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will yield for that time; but I will first ask that the first reading of the Indian appropriation bill be dispensed with. It will have to be read section by section for amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I object. My reason is that I do not desire to have the bill taken up now. It has just been printed and laid upon our tables.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEWART was granted indefinite leave of absence.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] one of the managers on the part of the House, asked that a warrant might be issued by order of the House for the arrest of Mr. Charles Woolley, of Cincinnati, Ohio, stating that in contempt of the writ of the House that gentleman had absented himself from the city.

Mr. UPSON. Is that a personal explanation?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not rise to a personal explanation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I so understood it.

The SPEAKER. When the floor is given to a gentleman for explanation, if he is not limited to a specific subject, he is alone the judge, keeping himself within the parliamentary rules.

Mr. MORGAN. More than two hours before the proceeding in the House to which I have referred Mr. Woolley, who was at Willard's Hotel, sent the following telegram to my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM:]

May 18, 11.15 a. m., 1868.

To Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM, Committee-room of the Judiciary, House of Representatives:

I will esteem it a favor if you will inform me by telegraph the exact time when you can examine me.

C. W. WOOLLEY.

Willard's.

It is due to Mr. Woolley to say, Mr. Speaker, that no gentleman in the community in which he lives is more highly esteemed than he is; and I feel the more called upon to make this statement because of the statement of the gentleman who represents his district yesterday, that he had no apology to make for Mr. Woolley. Nor do I feel called upon to make an apology for him: the facts are the best apology.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I said, as apology had been made on that side of the House, I would make none. What was in the morning papers, excepting the Globe, I did not say.

Mr. MORGAN. I am happy to be corrected. I am happy to know that he has been misrepresented. I also hold in my hand the subpoena served upon Mr. Woolley, and it shows the fact that although it bore the date "17th of May," it had been corrected to the 18th, making it dated the day after it was served. Consequently it was impossible for Mr. Woolley to know, with this mistake upon an irregular and unauthorized proceeding, what time he was really to be called upon.

I am not the only person in the House that knows Mr. Woolley. I am happy to know that one of my colleagues on the other side of the House is well acquainted with him, and I will yield to him for a moment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know Mr. Woolley very well, and said yesterday to the manager presenting the case that whatever had been done, I was of the belief that Mr. Woolley, properly notified, would return to the city and submit to any examination demanded. I think the facts will turn out to be something like these: that Mr. Woolley being served on Sunday with a summons, and having an impression, on account of the day of the service, and perhaps because, as it is claimed, that it was dated on the 18th while it was served on the 17th, that it was not a summons which in any sense he was bound to obey, started off to New York, intending to go to Cincinnati, under that impression; but being advised by a friend at some point on the way that he might get himself in trouble, no matter whether the summons was regular or irregular, thought he had better return. I have no doubt, from my knowledge of the character of Mr. Woolley, that in any case, being served with process, he would make his appearance here. So I said yesterday to the managers, and so I suppose now.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether Mr. Woolley was not in the city at six o'clock yesterday morning?

Mr. SCHENCK. That is more than I know. I never knew of his return to this city until it was mentioned here.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Had you no such information?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood that to be so.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman asks if I was informed of it. The first I knew of it was the remark made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STEWART,] who said yesterday, in explanation to the managers, that he had heard that Mr. Woolley had returned. Up to that time I supposed him to be probably in New York, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to make a statement in reference to this bill?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I decline to yield.

On agreeing to the motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, there were—ayes 50, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and WINDOM.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 66, nays 19, not voting 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Chanler, Cobb, Covode, Driggs, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Haight, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Loan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, McClurg, McCormick, Mercer, Morgan, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Poland, Robertson, Sawyer, Scofield, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, and William B. Washburn—66.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Beatty, Grover, Harding, Higby, Holman, Julian, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Marvin, Maynard, Pile, Pruyn, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Van Trump, and Windom—19.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Elia, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Griswold, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Humphrey, Jencks, Judd, Kerr, Knott, Ladin, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Peters, Phelps, Polesley, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Raum, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shoelabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—104.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, there is no decision by the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next?

The SPEAKER. It is not; it requires a quorum to do that.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and thereupon (at two o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of the Workingmen's Union of Tennessee, for the abolishment of the national banks and the payment of the principal of the United States bonds in greenbacks.

By Mr. HIGBY: The petition of John H. Garges, for compensation.

By Mr. ORTH: The petition of H. S. Mayo and others, of La Fayette, Indiana, praying for reduction of Government expenses and consequent reduction of national taxes.

Also, the petition of Robert Simpson, in reference to foreign emigration.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 20, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1101) in relation to the merchant marine of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. EGGLESTON, from the Committee on Commerce, by unanimous consent, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 594) to take possession of the bar known as Pass à l'Ouvre, at the entrance of the Mississippi river, and to construct a canal without any expense to the Government, and moved that the same be recommended to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALBERT ST. ORES.

Mr. PAINÉ, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1102) to reimburse Albert St. Ores, of Guallala, in the State of California, for certain expenditures in the recruiting service in the year 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1103) to incorporate the National Capital Publishing Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MENDOCINO INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent to present the resolutions of the Legislature of California, asking that the Mendocino Indian reservation be abandoned and the lands be opened for preemption.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

ADJOURNMENT TILL SATURDAY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the officers of the House have informed him that they have the matting and chairs, &c., ready to put the Hall in the usual summer garb. The Chair is doubtful if there is a quorum of the House in the city.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will first hear the statement of the Chair.

Mr. CHANLER. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state that he is doubtful if there is a quorum of the House in the city, and it is therefore for the House to determine as to what action it will take, whether it will adjourn from day to day or adjourn over.

Mr. HIGBY. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

Mr. THOMAS. Why not move to adjourn till Monday?

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done under the Constitution. Saturday is the longest time to which the House can adjourn.

Mr. PILE. Can we adjourn till Saturday without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. If it is the pleasure of the House, it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Would it not be in order to have the same understanding that was suggested yesterday by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] that immediately on the meeting of the House on Saturday it shall adjourn till Monday?

The SPEAKER. If the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] shall be agreed to, the Chair will then state that suggestion by itself. Less than a quorum can, however, adjourn from Saturday to Monday; but it requires unanimous consent to adjourn from to-day till Saturday without a quorum.

Mr. KELSEY. I hope the House will not adjourn over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. KELSEY] objects.

Mr. KELSEY. It is intimated that we shall have business here coming from the managers, important business to transact.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We had better notify the managers that we are sitting here ready for business, and not keep the House waiting.

Mr. HIGBY. I insist upon my motion.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. HIGBY, that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 42, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HIGBY and Mr. KELSEY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 52, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Mr. KELSEY. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] is first in order, being a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn. Upon that motion the yeas and nays have been called.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I moved to adjourn because I am satisfied that we cannot get a quorum here to do business to-day. I am as anxious as any man can be to get at work on the appropriation bills, but we cannot do it without a quorum.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. HIGBY; and there were—yeas 44, nays 42, not voting 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Blair, Bromwell, Brooks, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Donnelly, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Higby, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kelley, Knott, George V. Lawrence, McCormick, Mercer, Morgan, Morrell, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Poland, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, John T. Wilson, and Windom—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Blaine, Cobb, Covode, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Fields, Gravely, Harding, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladin, Loughridge, Marvin, McClurg, Newcomb, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polesley, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffe, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, and William B. Washburn—42.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Elia, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Griswold, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Humphrey, Jencks, Judd, Kerr, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shoelabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—103.

The SPEAKER, upon announcing the vote, said, the motion to adjourn till Saturday next is lost, because it requires a quorum to adjourn over one day.

Mr. COVODE. Is it in order, in order to make up a quorum, to count those members who are absent on committees authorized to sit during the sessions of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not. They have a right to vote at any time before the result of the vote is announced whether they were present before the last name on the roll was called or came in afterward; but they must be present and vote in order to be counted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. BAILEY and Mr. ROBINSON.

Indefinite leave of absence was also granted to Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. PRUYN, on account of sickness; to Mr. HOLMAN, on account of sickness in his family; and to Mr. KELLEY, on account of indisposition.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist now upon my motion to adjourn.

Mr. PILE. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence of any other motion but one to fix the time to which the adjournment shall be made.

Mr. PIKE. I suppose we can adjourn with the general understanding that no business shall be done to-morrow, but that we shall meet and adjourn from day to day until the matting is put down in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELSEY] has objected. The Chair is informed that it will take about three days to put down the matting.

Mr. PIKE. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his objection. It is evident no business can be done even if we do meet.

Mr. KELSEY. I do not withdraw my objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 33, nays 59, not voting 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Bailey, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Donnelly, Driggs, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grover, Higby, Holman, Jones, Julian, Kelley, George V. Lawrence, McCormick, Morgan, O'Neill, Poland, Ross, Schenck, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, and John T. Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Blaine, Brooks, Butler, Cobb, Covode, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Fields, Golladay, Gravely, Haight, Harding, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Ketchum, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, Loughridge, Marvin, McClurg, Mercur, Morrill, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polley, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—59.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beek, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boyer, Bromall, Buckland, Burr, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Finney, Fox, Gelz, Griswold, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Judd, Kerr, Knott, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Peters, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Seifield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Aiken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Welke, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—97.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to adjourn, and no quorum has voted.

Mr. PILE. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to—yeas twenty-one, noes not counted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Now, I wish to submit a proposition by unanimous consent. There is no quorum here. I understand the managers do not expect to ask the intervention of the House in any matters before them, and the only question is whether we are to go away or meet here from day to day to do nothing but pass on dilatory motions.

Mr. PILE. How many do we lack of a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Six members.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state further, that if we adjourn over the House can be put in its summer trim. If we do not, we shall have to take three or four days at a time when we are engaged in business.

Several MEMBERS. Say till Monday.

The SPEAKER. Under the Constitution the House cannot adjourn till Monday.

Mr. HIGBY. Let it be understood, by unanimous consent, that the Speaker shall adjourn the House from Saturday till Monday.

The SPEAKER. Less than a quorum can adjourn from Saturday till Monday, being but one legislative day. If there is no objection, the motion of the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope there will be an understanding that there will be no business on Saturday, so that the door-keepers may not be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the understanding that no business shall be transacted on Saturday except to entertain a motion to adjourn?

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it necessary that any resolution should be passed now to secure a settlement of the Hall?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. DRIGGS. I do not object to the understanding, but I suggest that there might possibly be a quorum here.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; we are all going away.

Mr. DRIGGS. I make no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. HARDING.

SALE OF IRON-CLADS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in answer to a House resolution of the 15th instant, copies of all correspondence between the Navy Department and any other parties relative to the sale of the iron-clads Oneota and Catawba; which was referred to the joint Committee on Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the courtesy of the House to be allowed not more than five minutes to make a statement personal to myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, if the feeling in the country in reference to impeachment and the result of the vote on last Saturday were an ordinary one I should not feel called upon to notice any assaults made upon myself in connection with that subject; but, much as I am opposed to personal explanations, I do not feel that I can, in justice to myself and to the constituency that I represent, allow an assault to be made upon myself which is scandalous and, perhaps, malicious. It is certainly without the slightest foundation, and seems to demand some notice from me. I cannot consent to sit here in my seat in the House and allow the public journals of the country to traduce me and attempt to blacken my character without some notice at my hands.

I hold in my hand a copy of the Chicago Republican of the date of Monday, May 18. In an editorial in that paper reviewing an article from the Chicago Tribune of the day previous, the 17th, among other things it is stated, in substance, that it is not surprising that the Chicago Tribune should have received news in advance of other journals of that city in reference to what the vote on impeachment would be, as it had means of information denied to the other journals at Chicago; that I took a "night trip" from Washington to Chicago to carry this news to the Tribune, and that the "TRUMBULL-GRIMES plot" was made by me. I state the substance of the charge, as the language of the Republican is intemperate and indecent. I should care but little about the language or the article if it had reference to any other subject than impeachment. What particular opinion the Chicago Republican may entertain of myself is a matter of perhaps small consequence, although it is better to have the good opinion of all, and I have in my life endeavored to merit it.

This article charges, in substance, that there is a plot between certain Senators and others to secure the acquittal of the President; that I am in that plot; that the Chicago Tribune is in the plot, and that I took a trip from here to Chicago to give the Tribune information. What particular advantage there could be in that, if true, to the Tribune I cannot yet see. But I wish to state, and do state most emphatically, that the whole charge, from beginning to end, so far as concerns myself, is absolutely and unqualifiedly false. There is not even a shadow of truth to base it upon. On the 2d of this month I left this city for my home in Peoria with the view of attending the congressional convention, which was held in Galesburg on the 5th instant, and also the State convention, which was held in Peoria on the 6th instant. I left Washington for the purpose of attending those two conventions, and took the usual route home by way of Baltimore, Harrisburg, and Chicago to Peoria. I arrived in Chicago on Monday, the 4th, and left there the next morning for Peoria. During the time I was in Chicago it so happened that I never met no one of the editors of the Tribune or anybody in any way associated with that paper; neither did I speak on the subject of the impeachment to any human being who had any interest or connection with the Tribune to my knowledge.

This article, from beginning to end, in so far as it refers to me, has not the slightest tint of truth in it. I knew no more with regard to the vote on impeachment or how any individual Senator intended to vote than any other and all the other members in this House. I want to make this statement distinctly that, since the commencement of the impeachment trial, I have never spoken one word to any Senator on the subject of his vote. I have abstained from expressing an opinion in the presence of Senators, feeling that I had no right to attempt to influence their judgments or to control their votes.

This much I have said in self-defense from what I know to be an unjustifiable assault.

REFERENCE OF BILLS.

The SPEAKER. Some of the committees of this House will meet during the recess; and as there are a number of bills from the Senate upon the Speaker's table, if there be no objection the Chair will lay them before the House so that they may be referred to their appropriate committees. Should the reference of any bill be objected to by any member it will remain on the Speaker's table.

No objection was made.

NAVAJO INDIANS.

The first business on the Speaker's table were amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 733, for the relief of the Navajo Indians at the Bosque Redondo, and to establish them on a reservation; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SCHOOL PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

The next business on the Speaker's table were amendments of the Senate to amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 389, exempting property in the District of Columbia held and used for school purposes from local taxation; which were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PRESENTATION OF BILLS TO PRESIDENT, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 366, regulating the presentation of bills to the President of the United States and the return of the same.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know what is in that bill. I think it had better be left on the Speaker's table.

GOLDSMITH BROTHERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 151, for the relief of Goldsmith Brothers, of the cities of San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, brokers.

Mr. ROSS. I think that bill had better be allowed to remain on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. ROSS. Very well; I have no objection if it is not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. None of these bills will be brought back by motions to reconsider, if that is the general understanding.

The bill was then read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

JAMES HOOPER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 436, for the relief of James Hooper.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in regard to vessels captured by rebels during the late war.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

FILING REPORTS OF RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 450, relative to filing reports of railroad companies; which was taken up and read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. ALLISON. This bill relates to the Pacific railroads, and I think it should be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

PARKER QUINCE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 452, for the relief of Parker Quince; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

QUALIFICATION OF JURORS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 464, in relation to the qualification of jurors; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MOSES F. SHINN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 467, to confirm an entry of land by Moses F. Shinn; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. The motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN DAN. ELLIS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 474, for the relief of Captain Dan. Ellis; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This is a bill in relation to services as a scout.

Mr. PILE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

H. D. M'KINNEY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 476, for the relief of H. D. McKinney; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This is a claim for balance due on a wood contract.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

CHARLES C. O'NEILL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 477, for the relief of Charles C. O'Neill; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

GEORGE B. HALSTEAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 128, for the relief of George B. Halstead; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This is for pay as lieutenant.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLAIMS FOR A VESSEL IN JAPAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 123, authorizing the Secretary of State to adjust certain claims, and directing the payment thereof; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This is about a vessel in Japan.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SURVEY OF INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The last bill on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 170, to provide for deficiency of expenses incurred in the survey of Indian reservations; which was read a first and second time.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, the bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the votes by which the various bills and joint resolutions were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN PEACE COMMISSION.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the House what, if any, extra compensation, allowances, or emoluments, either as mileage, commutation, or expenses, or in any other form, have been allowed to civil and military officers who were authorized by the act of Congress approved July 20, 1867, to act as a commission to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes, or to clerks in their employ who were at the same time receiving a fixed salary as clerks in any executive department.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. DRIGGS, (at one o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned till Saturday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. DRIGGS: The papers of James H. Foster, asking an appropriation to pay him for balance of salary due as agent of the Government, with copy of a bill which passed the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of Emily H. Reed, for compensation for quartermaster stores taken for the use of the United States Army.

By Mr. GRAVELY: The petition of Mr. Stoops, praying that a certain road in North Carolina and Virginia be declared a post route.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of E. S. J. Nealley and 35 others, of Bath, Maine, for improvement of Richmond Island harbor, adjacent to Cape Elizabeth, on the coast of Maine.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of Emily Miller, for compensation.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 21, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Monday last was dispensed with.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 19th instant, signed the following bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 416) for the relief of John S. Cunningham, paymaster United States Navy;

A bill (S. No. 462) making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and other contingent expenses of the Senate for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 473) for the relief of Charles E. Capehart;

A bill (S. No. 358) providing for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander Trevett Abbott, of the United States Navy, to the active list of the Navy;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 118) for the appointment of a commission to select suitable locations for powder magazines; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 126) for the relief of George W. Doty, a commander in the United States Navy on the retired list.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th of April last, information relative to any application by any party for exclusive privilege in connection with hunting and trading and the fisheries in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating a copy of the constitution of the State of Georgia, framed under the reconstruction laws; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating all the papers that have been submitted to him relating to the formation of constitutions under the reconstruction laws in the States of North Carolina and Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 17, 1867, information in reference to the seizure and confiscation of property under the act of July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes;" which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a matter of privilege of the Senate, and ask to offer a resolution.

Mr. DRAKE. I suppose that petitions and memorials are first in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are in order, but the Senator from Kentucky rises to a question of privilege, which supersedes all other things.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the resolution that I offer be read, and then I will let it lie until the morning business is over.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there is reason to believe that some persons have been and are engaged in violating the rights or privileges of the Senate by the use of threats, intimidation, and other unlawful and improper means toward its members to constrain them in their consideration, action, and judgment in the matter of the articles of impeachment against the President of the United States now pending before the Senate as a court of impeachment: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of three, to be chosen by the Senate, do proceed to inquire into the facts of such imputed threats, intimidation, and other unlawful and improper means aforesaid, and the names of the persons, if any, using or that have used them; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to take evidence, employ a stenographer, and report the facts to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I feel it my duty to offer the resolution, but I am willing that it should lie over informally in order that the morning business may be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so passed over unless objection be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of underwriters and merchants of New York, praying that no means be adopted to lessen the efficiency of the Coast Survey; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of Barney Carney, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Seymour White, praying to be relieved from civil disabilities imposed by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of officers of the New York Produce Exchange, praying an additional appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Buffalo; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Buffalo, New York, praying that the city of Milwaukee be reimbursed for money expended by that city in constructing a straight cut from Lake Michigan to the Milwaukee river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DRAKE presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of St. Louis, Missouri, praying Congress to order a survey of Bayou Manchac and its connections between the Mississippi river and the Gulf of Mexico, and to clear out the obstructions in the sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of iron manufacturers and engineers, of Baltimore, praying that the rank assigned the engineers and other staff officers by the Navy Department be confirmed by law of Congress, and in favor of a continuation of the system of education of our naval engineers at the United States Naval Academy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of John H. Russell, praying that a patent may be issued to him for certain land in Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FERRY presented a petition of Dorence Atwater, praying compensation for pay withheld from him, and for loss of time and health in prisons, and for preparing a list of dead soldiers at Andersonville; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of manufacturers of goods, in whole or in part, of ivory, praying a repeal of the duty on ivory; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of Baptiste Peoria, chief of the Peoria tribe of Indians, praying compensation for a horse taken from him by United States forces; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of Lucien Birdseye, praying compensation for the use and occupation of his property known as Point Lookout; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1099) for the relief of Wait Talcott;

A bill (H. R. No. 483) for the relief of Palcom John; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1063) for the relief of Henry Barricklow.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, Friday of each week be set apart for the consideration of bills on the Calendar relating to the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that had better lie over. There have been one or two days set apart for the business of the District of Columbia, and there are a great many other matters that ought to be attended to. I do not think it would be wise to adopt the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

BRIDGES ON OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RIVERS.

Mr. HARLAN. If there is no further morning business, I move that the unfinished business of the last day's session be taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. MORTON. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which will come up at one o'clock.

Mr. MORTON. If it is in order, I will move to take up for reference the resolution I offered the other day in reference to bridging the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his motion?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on Monday last:

Resolved, That House bill No. 384, to authorize the building of a railroad bridge across the Ohio river at Paducah, Kentucky, be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and that the said committee be requested to consider of, and if in their judgment thought best, to report a general bill authorizing bridges to be constructed over the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, upon such terms and conditions as will not materially interfere with navigation.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I should like the indulgence of the committee and of the Senate for a short time in making a statement on this subject and laying before the Senate and before the committee certain facts which I have collected.

The subject is one of great interest and importance to the people of the Northwest, and to all, in fact, who are interested in the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. Ten bridges have already been authorized by act of Congress across the upper Mississippi, which, I undertake to say, if constructed, will substantially destroy the navigation of the upper Mississippi. This bill, which I propose to refer back to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, has passed the House of Representatives, authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio river at Paducah, and another bill is now in possession of the same committee authorizing the construction of a bridge on similar terms across the Ohio at Cincinnati. I will state briefly the terms of the bill which I propose to refer back to the committee.

The bill itself does not prescribe the character of the bridge, but it refers to the act of 1866, authorizing the construction of a bridge across the upper Mississippi at Quincy, Illinois, and those provisions are made applicable to this bridge. That act first authorizes the construction of a draw, to be a pivot draw, and to be one hundred and sixty feet in the draw; or, it authorizes the construction of a high bridge, the spans to be two hundred and fifty feet in length, and the central span over the current to be three hundred feet in length. It gives the company in the case of the Paducah bridge, as is done in regard to all the bridges on the upper Mississippi that I have referred to, the privilege of constructing a draw of only one hundred and sixty feet in width. These draws will substantially destroy the navigation of those rivers, because boats and tows, large steamboats, cannot pass them in safety except in the day time, and cannot pass them in safety then with high winds or high waters; but with rafts and tow boats they cannot be passed at all except under the most favorable circumstances.

The privilege in this bill of constructing a draw-bridge ought to be absolutely withdrawn, for reasons which I will present to the committee, and the privilege of constructing a high bridge with a span of only three hundred feet over the center or current of the river ought to be denied, and the span should not be less than five hundred feet. The bridge authorized at Steubenville, and which has been constructed, has demonstrated beyond all question the fact that a bridge with a span of only three hundred feet is a great impediment to navigation, and that a few such bridges constructed over the Ohio river would virtually destroy its navigation. One bad bridge becomes the protection of another, and if these obstructions are multiplied they will become too great for any power of removal, and the substantial navigation of the river will be gone for ever. It is, therefore, Mr. President, of the utmost importance that without delay there should be some general law enacted in reference to the bridging of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, some general law enacted which will protect the interests of navigation.

We must foster the railroad interest also. The interests of navigation and of the railroads are not incompatible; they are not antagonistic, but both may exist together. But, sir, the navigation of the great rivers is of the first importance to the people of the United States, and it is the duty of Congress to protect the navigation of those streams against the construction of improper bridges.

The Ohio river is one thousand and fifty miles in length. The extent and value of the freights that pass up and down it are almost incalculable. I have seen one estimate that the freights on the Ohio river are equal in extent and value to all the freights carried by all the railroads in the United States. I will not vouch for the truth of this statement; but I have seen it presented as having been carefully made. Freight upon the great rivers is cheaper from four fifths to one half than it can possibly be on railroads; and it is, therefore, to the interest of all the people living near these rivers, or whose commerce or trade passes upon them, that the navigation of them shall not be impaired by the construction of bridges.

Now, sir, one single item in regard to the Ohio river in reference to the coal trade. The coal which supplies the river towns and the country bordering on the river from Pittsburg to New Orleans, a distance of twenty-one hundred miles, passes down the Ohio river from Pittsburg and from the neighboring towns. The coal trade of the city of Cincinnati alone, it is said, requires twenty-three million bushels annually; but when we estimate the vast lumber business, the salt business, and the iron business that is carried on upon that river, in connection with all the ordinary produce business of that vast valley, we can but faintly comprehend the importance of protecting the navigation of the Ohio river.

Mr. President, I want to read, in the hearing of the Senate, the opinion that has been given by fifty-eight licensed pilots of the Ohio river. Opposite the name of each pilot is placed the length of time he has served as a licensed pilot, and the average is over twenty years:

CINCINNATI, May 6, 1868.

We, the undersigned, licensed pilots on the Ohio river, hereby declare that it would be difficult and dangerous for us to navigate large and heavily laden steamboats and boats with tows of barges between the piers of a bridge having a span of only three hundred feet between the piers over the channel, even though the bridge was built at right angles to the current, and the piers in a line with the current.

While this danger and obstruction at a low stage of the river would be comparatively small, it would be increased with the rise of water in the river, until at a stage of twenty feet and upwards, when the heavy business, especially in towing, is done, it would be very serious. We regard it as clear to the mind of any sensible river man and navigator that the placing of five or six piers within the banks of our narrow river will, by dividing the water at the piers, create "cross currents" and "eddies" dangerous to navigation. The water above the piers will be higher than below, and the force of the current materially increased, varying, of course, with the stage of water. To be reasonably safe the length of span should be five hundred feet.

This, I repeat, is the testimony of fifty-eight licensed pilots of the Ohio river, whose average experience is over twenty years. It is the best testimony that can be offered in regard to the dangerous character of these obstructions. In connection with these obstructions and the increased dangers of navigation, delay, and so on, is the question of insurance. The insurance of steamboats, flatboats, barges, and the insurance of their cargoes is now a necessary element in all commercial calculations of profit and loss. I now present resolutions signed by the agents and officers of forty-four insurance companies, to show that by the construction of bridges having only a span of three hundred feet over the current of the river the rates of insurance must be increased, and that this increase of the rates of insurance must increase with the construction of every new bridge; and therefore, if one bridge at Steubenville is a great obstruction, twenty bridges of the same kind would make an obstruction twenty times as great, and in this way, by the gradual multiplication of these bridges, the navigation of the river will be destroyed. The following is the statement made by the underwriters representing forty-four insurance companies:

CINCINNATI, April 20, 1868.

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your letter of April 18, asking the opinion of the Board of Underwriters of this city if the construction of a pier bridge across the Ohio with three hundred feet space between the piers would so obstruct the navigation as to require an advance rate of premium on boats and their cargoes plying between Cincinnati and Pittsburg, at a meeting of the board held at their rooms April 20, 1868, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the board, and are herewith inclosed as an answer to your communication:

Resolved, That it is the deliberate and settled opinion of the Cincinnati Board of Underwriters that a bridge built across the Ohio river between the cities of Cincinnati and Newport, Kentucky, with piers in the river three hundred feet apart, would prove a serious and dangerous obstruction to the navigation of the river; and that all underwriters, in justice to their stockholders, will be obliged to charge increased rates for the insurance of property passing these piers.

Resolved, That it is the judgment of the members of this board that where bridges are built over the Ohio river, that in order to leave the navigation of the river reasonably safe, there should be a main span over the channel not less than five hundred feet long."

Respectfully, yours, JOHN BURGOYNE,
President pro tempore.

JOHN J. HOOKER, Secretary.

MESSRS. ROBERT HOSEA & SON, TRABER & AUBERY, BABBITT, HARKNESS & CO., M. GREENWOOD, DAVID GIBSON & CO., WILLIAM GLENN & SONS, R. M. BISHOP & CO., WILLIAM RESOR & CO., and others.

I will simply say, in addition to this evidence on the part of these insurance companies, that the carrying trade is in the hands of the insurance companies in this way: by increasing the rate of insurance the carrying trade can be controlled as to particular ships or channels. It was not the Alabama in herself that drove the carrying trade into British ships during the war and drove American ships out of the trade, but it was the insurance companies that so increased the rate of insurance upon American ships and cargoes in American ships that shippers could ship far more cheaply in British bottoms; and thus it was that the carrying trade of our country was virtually destroyed during the war by one or two rebel cruisers. The same thing will operate in the case of obstructions placed upon any navigable river. They increase the rates of insurance to such an extent that the rates of transportation are greatly increased, and thus transportation is driven from the river into other channels, and the people who consume the produce thus transported have to pay the additional cost.

I desire to present in this connection the testimony of the city council of Cincinnati. The city council of Cincinnati has recently adopted the following:

"Whereas by an act passed April 3, 1868, certain parties have organized for the purpose of building a bridge at Cincinnati; the main span of said bridge is to be but three hundred feet over the main channel of the Ohio river; and whereas said span is entirely inadequate to the wants of the boating and commercial interests of our State, and dangerous to life and property, by obstructing the channel of said river: Therefore,

Be it resolved, By the city council of the city of Cincinnati, that our members of the General Assembly be requested to use all honorable means to cause said law to be amended as proposed in the bill now pending before the Legislature, making said span not less than five hundred feet."

Mr. President, in order to explain briefly how it is that a span of three hundred feet is not sufficient, I will state in what mode the heavy freights upon the Ohio river are transported. It is done now chiefly by what are called barges and tug-boats. They have some sixty tug-boats going out from Pittsburg for the purpose of towing coal-boats only. These coal-boats are fastened upon each side of the steam tug. Sometimes these tows on the upper Ohio are one hundred and fifty feet in width, as I am informed.

Mr. JOHNSON. All lashed together.

Mr. MORTON. All lashed together, and shoving perhaps four or six coal-barges before them. By towing the coal-boats in this way the transportation is made very cheap as compared with the old way of floating a flat-boat down the river; and this has become the received method of transporting heavy freights on the Ohio river. Some of these tows when thus lashed together are one hundred and fifty feet in width, and when they approach the Steubenville bridge, if the wind is high and the current strong, they are compelled to wait. They can never safely pass that bridge in the night time. The delay is a matter of heavy cost to them, at the rate of one hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars a day, as the case may be. They must lie by until the daylight in order to pass the bridge; and if the wind is high it is very difficult to pass without a collision. It is an immense mass of freight, sometimes as much as one hundred thousand bushels of coal being in the tow. It is, of course, very hard to steer a collection of boats of that kind; and great losses have occurred.

On the lower Ohio below the falls these tows are made wider than above. With a strong current or with a high wind they cannot safely pass any bridge with only a span of three hundred feet, they are so unwieldy. It is therefore a matter of the first importance that the piers of the bridges shall be so far apart that these steamboats and tug-boats with the barges attached shall be able to pass even in the night time without delay, and shall be able to pass without danger even when there are winds and strong currents. This is impossible with any bridge having a span of only three hundred feet.

Now, sir, I will read a single resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Cincinnati:

Resolved, That every bridge over the Ohio river should be required to have at least one span of not less than five hundred feet over the main channel; and that piers which shall narrow the navigation more than this will be a serious and unjustifiable obstruction and danger. We therefore ask the General Assembly of Ohio and the Congress of the United States to provide that all bridges over this river shall be required to have at least one span of not less than five hundred feet over the main channel."

Some question may be asked as to whether bridges of five hundred feet are practicable. I have evidence here that perhaps will be satisfactory to every member of the Senate that they are not only practicable, but that they are of very little more cost than bridges of three hundred feet span. In the advance of engineering science it is found that bridges of five hundred feet span can be constructed to bear any burden that may be put upon them, and that the cost is very little greater, and some engineers, say no greater than those with a span of three hundred feet. I will ask the Secretary to read a letter from John A. Roebling, who constructed the suspension bridge at Niagara and the suspension bridge at Cincinnati, and who is now constructing a bridge of sixteen hundred and twenty feet over the Hudson river just above the city of New York, and who, I believe, will construct a bridge over the East river at New York, which has a span amounting to I do not know what; I believe, in the neighborhood of fifteen hundred feet.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the honorable Senator say he is constructing a bridge above the city of New York?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; at the Highlands, some sixteen miles above, with a span of sixteen hundred and twenty feet.

Mr. JOHNSON. A suspension bridge?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir. I will read the letter of Mr. Roebling on that subject, which is short, and to which I invite the attention of the Senate:

OFFICE OF JOHN A. ROEBLING,
TRENTON, NEW JERSEY, April 7, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: In your note of the 4th you request me to state some of the facts relating to the practicability of large span railroad bridges. The following railway bridges, all on leading lines and doing a heavy business, are constructed on different plans, and have all stood the test of time:

The Niagara bridge, in this country, with one clear span of eight hundred and twenty feet.

The Steubenville bridge, over the Ohio, three hundred and twenty feet.

The Britannia bridge, in England, spans of four hundred and sixty feet.

The Saltash bridge, over the Tamar, England, spans of four hundred and fifty-five feet.

The Rhine bridge, at Cullinburg, in Holland, spans of five hundred feet.

The Disnaw bridge, over the Weichsel, in Prussia, three hundred and ninety feet.

The Hogat bridge, in Prussia, three hundred and twenty feet.

The Rhine bridge, at Cologne, Prussia, three hundred and twenty feet.

The Rhine bridge, at Coblenz, Prussia, three hundred and twenty feet.

The Rhine bridge, at Mayence, Prussia, three hundred and thirty-two feet.

I might extend this list, but if this number is not sufficient to establish "practicability," no number and no argument will. When I recommended five hundred feet spans I was fully aware that bridge builders and railroad men generally would object, because the erection of large spans certainly involves a little more cost and also a little more skill. But by combining the suspension principle with the truss, as I have often recommended, a considerable saving will be effected. Spans of five hundred feet on this plan will not cost more than ordinary lattice or truss spans of three hundred and fifty feet.

For the Cincinnati and Newport bridge I would recommend a trussed suspension bridge, with a middle span of seven to eight hundred feet, and two half spans of three hundred and fifty to four hundred feet, as the best and also the cheapest in the end. The various stories circulated about the Niagara bridge are all nonsense. That bridge will admit of the highest practicable speed for passing trains, but it would be madness to permit it over that fearful chasm.

Truly, yours, JOHN A. ROEBLING.
THEODORE COOK, esq.

Mr. President, in this connection I will read a very important letter from Captain Eads, who is the engineer constructing the bridge across the Mississippi river at St. Louis, which has a central span of five hundred and eighteen feet:

St. Louis, April 7, 1868.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter I beg to say that no published official report of this bridge has yet been made. I am at present engaged in the preparation of one, and as the company expect to ask our citizens to make a loan of the city's credit to the extent of $4,000,000 in aid of the enterprise at the next election, the report will be an elaborate one. It will not, however, be published for nearly a month, as it will contain several diagrams and illustrations now in the hands of the engravers. I am glad to see the friends of river navigation moving so earnestly to prevent the destruction of our great marine highways. After the able letter of Mr. Roebling, recently published in one of our city papers, and which you have doubtless seen, I feel that I can say nothing to add to its force.

By the principle of the arch, either suspended or upright, we are enabled to construct much larger spans without increasing the cost of the structure than is possible by any of the methods of trusses yet devised. Being placed in possession of the calculations made for the truss bridge at this city, (by the consolidation of the two companies,) I am able to prove that the bridge I am constructing, with three spans of about five hundred feet each, can be more cheaply built than the truss bridge designed for the rival company, with two spans of but three hundred and sixty-four feet, (or a clear water-way to each of three hundred and fifty feet,) and the remaining spans of two hundred and forty feet.

The greater strength of cast steel makes its cost considerably less than that of iron in long spans; and as its compressive strength is greatly in excess of its tensile strength, it seems peculiarly fitted for the construction of upright arches. There is nothing to prevent the spanning of your river at Cincinnati with arches of one thousand feet with entire safety, and at a cost not greatly in excess of three hundred and fifty feet trusses. In every form of truss there must be an upper and lower chord, one for compression and one for tension. The arch alone, of all forms of bridging, requires but one of these members. The suspended arch requires the tension member only, and the upright arch the compression one. The anchors of the suspension bridge supply the place of the upper or compression member of the Fink truss, by preventing the points of support from being pulled together, the strain at the points of support (or towers) being transferred directly to the anchors. In the upright arch the abutments supply the place of the tension chord in the bow-string girder. The same principle pervades every form of truss known, and as there is no great difference in the weight or cost of one or the other of these members, if one or the other be dispensed with, we have at least the cost of it to invest in masonry before we incur any additional expense by substituting the arch. As, however, the cost of the truss rapidly augments as the span is increased, while the arch does not, in the same ratio we are enabled to construct large spans in that form with much greater economy.

In the short limits of a letter like this I cannot explain why the arch is so much more economical, except in the brief manner above stated: nor would it, perhaps, be becoming in me to attempt to do so here. When my report is published I shall be happy to send you a copy.

Very truly, &c., JAMES B. EADS.
Mr. THEODORE COOK.

Even, Mr. President, if a bridge of five hundred feet span was more costly, yet the railroad companies should be required to incur the cost. If they cost three times as much, what is that cost compared to the permanent obstruction of a great river like the Ohio or the upper Mississippi? The cost of a bridge can hardly be taken into calculation in determining the question of how a bridge should be built. If a proper bridge cost three times or four times as much, still they should be required to build a bridge that will not materially interfere with navigation. It is a permanent and continuing injury, doubled every time a new bridge is built, one bridge becoming a protection for another, until these obstructions are too powerful to be removed.

I therefore ask the committee to consider this question, and report to the Senate a general law to provide for bridging the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, to the provisions of which all bridges shall be required to conform; that these bridges shall be high enough, say sixty feet above high water, to enable steamers to pass without obstruction; and that they shall have spans of not less than five hundred feet. Bridges with this span can be built. We know that. They have been. They have been in use for years in other countries. Engineering science has greatly advanced. They can be built with very little more cost than the ordinary bridges; and thus the railroad interest can be protected and fostered at the same time that the navigation of these great rivers is not impaired.

I know, sir, that this is rather a tame question to be considered now in connection with the exciting and stirring events by which we are surrounded; but the question is of vast importance to all the northwestern States, and I invite the attention of this committee to it. I hope if they are not satisfied that they will call engineers, experienced and scientific men, before them, and examine them as to the feasibility of constructing bridges with spans of five hundred feet; and if they are not satisfied that a bridge of three hundred feet span over the Ohio and Mississippi rivers is an obstruction, let them call witnesses upon that subject.

I have here, Mr. President, resolutions adopted by a meeting of the manufacturers and principal business men of Pittsburgh, the meeting being presided over by the mayor, all to the same effect with what I have read; and also resolutions of the Coal Exchange of Pittsburgh and various bodies of business men to the same effect. I will not detain the Senate this morning by reading these resolutions. I will, however, lay them before the committee, and I have deemed it my duty to present the matter to the Senate in this way, because from the attention and examination I have given to it I am satisfied it is of the first importance to the people of the northwestern States.

I hope that this Paducah bridge bill will not pass in its present form, and that the Cincinnati bridge bill will not pass; and I hope that the law authorizing the construction of ten bridges on the upper Mississippi will be repealed. None of them have yet been constructed, but if built in accordance with the law by which they are authorized they will utterly destroy the navigation of the river. I hope the law authorizing them will be repealed, or at least so modified as to require the companies authorized to build those bridges to build them with central spans of not less than five hundred feet. The railroad companies can do this with very little more cost, and their interests will be protected, while the navigation of these great rivers will be preserved.

That is all I have to say this morning, Mr. President. I ask that the documents which I submit may be referred to the committee with the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to make a few remarks on those documents before they are referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of the last sitting.

Mr. POMEROY. I only desire to say a very few words. My friend from Indiana will find the subject surrounded with a great many difficulties, and I want to point out some of those difficulties before it goes to the committee. That is all.

Mr. MORTON. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish my friend would give way, that I may make a motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to considering this matter any other day.

Mr. SUMNER. Let my motion be put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts may be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion is not in order. The unfinished business is regularly before the Senate, but it can be passed over by unanimous consent, if that is the wish of the body.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the unfinished business will be waived for the present, that the Senator from Kansas may make his remarks on the matter brought before the Senate by the resolution of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to consider that subject this morning?

Mr. POMEROY. Not at any length; only for five or ten minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. What subject is it?

Mr. POMEROY. The subject of bridges on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, to which the Senator from Indiana has directed the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Then the unfinished business, I understand, will be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside informally if that is the desire of the Senate. No objection being made, the Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. POMEROY. I was only about to say that the subject is surrounded with difficulties. There are great difficulties in making a general law applicable to all places and all rivers. I admit that it is very desirable, so far as the river navigation is concerned, that there should be no piers and to have suspension bridges everywhere; but the practical question is can such bridges be erected everywhere. The engineers, from whom letters have been read, say that there should be no spans short of five hundred feet in the center of the river. Now, sir, there are no five hundred feet spans in this country or any country where the bridge rests upon piers. That is not practicable. I admit that a suspension bridge may be built one thousand feet or twelve hundred feet wide, and they are supported every five or ten feet from the vast cable that forms the arch, and I do not know but that they could be built two thousand feet. But we are passing laws to enable railroad companies to bridge the rivers upon piers in the form of truss bridges, and no truss bridge in this country or any country has been deemed safe over one hundred and fifty feet, or what they call three hundred feet span. The Senate, I suppose, are aware that if a pivot draw is used and the span is three hundred feet the draw itself must be six hundred feet besides the width of the pier on which the draw stands. If Senators who have had their attention directed to this matter will conceive of a draw six hundred feet long to be turned up and down the river upon a pivot in the wind they will see the almost utter impossibility of a draw of that character being that length even; and yet the Senator and these engineers insist that it should be five hundred feet, and if five hundred feet span the draw must be one thousand feet besides the width of the pier on which it stands.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Kansas perhaps did not understand me correctly. I am opposed, as I understand this question, to all draw-bridges across the river. It would be perhaps impracticable to have a draw of five hundred feet on each side of the pivot, which would make it one thousand feet. That is not contended for by anybody, but the draw-bridge which is authorized by this bill has a draw of only one hundred and sixty feet, which would not even admit many of the tows. They cannot get into it at all, because they are ten or twenty or thirty feet wider than the draw. I do not contend for any draw-bridge of that size. I do not know that it is practicable.

Mr. POMEROY. I was about to say, Mr. President, that it is not practicable in every place upon every river to make a suspension bridge. It becomes a question whether the public interests require and demand any bridge at all. If a bridge of any character and of any dimensions is demanded by the public interest and by the necessity of making a connection with railroads from each side of the river, then it is a serious question for those who legislate to determine what kind of a bridge is necessary. I admit, as the Senator from Indiana says, that a suspension bridge is the better bridge where it can be constructed; but suppose you have low banks and no bluffs on either side, no quarry, no rock to fasten your cables to, and it is impossible to get a train up ninety or one hundred feet, what are you to do? The Senator from Indiana says he wants the bridge fifty or sixty feet above high water. The Ohio river rises and falls from thirty-seven to forty feet. Put your bridge sixty feet above that, and your train will be one hundred feet in the air above low water, and you are expected to build up piers one hundred feet above low water and run a train over them. Mr. President, it is impracticable—it is impossible.

In the next place I wish to say that on the Ohio and the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers, where my attention has been called to it, there are places where a suspension bridge is entirely impracticable and out of the question, where it will be next to impossible to elevate the train so high; and then you cannot fasten in the banks on either side your cables, because there is nothing but what is known in this country as bottom ground on each side, and therefore the bridge must, from the nature of the case, be placed upon piers; and if upon piers it must have a draw; and if a draw, then I say it is impossible from any engineering known in this country or any country to make the span over three hundred feet. That has never yet been done. There is going to be an effort to try to accomplish it; but a bridge resting upon piers with a span of three hundred feet has not been accomplished yet. I do not know what may be done with a truss bridge combined with the suspension principle; but the experiment has not yet succeeded with a bridge simply resting upon piers, although it has been attempted in two or three places.

I rose simply to say that this subject is surrounded with difficulties if we intend to make a general law applicable to every river and to every place. Each point where a river is to be bridged must be judged of by itself, and that character of bridge must be adopted in the law which is adapted to the necessities of the particular case. I know there are some places where the banks themselves are not five hundred feet, and yet the Senator would have a general law compelling all spans to be five hundred feet when five hundred feet may be more than the entire width of the river.

So you will see, Mr. President, the entire fallacy, in fact the utter inutility, of making a general law applicable to all rivers and all places. The committee have had this matter under consideration at various times, and have not yet found it practicable to report a general law, but only to report each individual case according to the circumstances of the place and the river where the bridge was to be built.

The Senator says that these barges are one hundred and fifty feet in width. We have had a contest or two before the committee on that subject, and that width of barges to a steamboat was never proved yet. I do not know but that they could make them one hundred and fifty feet in width by tying enough of them together; but I have known a number of contested cases of this kind; and they have not yet got up to one hundred and fifty feet in width. They never pretended it in those cases where the trouble originated, in Iowa. The Senator will find that if he attempts to pass a general law applicable to all these rivers he will be met with this difficulty, that in some places it is impracticable, it will prevent the bridging of the river at all, and in other places the general law will not be adapted to the wants of the railway company. I have no objection to the reference of the subject to the committee, but the Senator will find it impossible to pass through such a bill if the committee shall report it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise, Mr. President, to a question of privilege.

Mr. POMEROY. Let this matter be referred to the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I want to say a word in reply to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I think that the Senator from Kansas, perhaps, is laboring under some misapprehension in regard to the exact idea which I endeavored to bring before the Senate. I should like to know, in the first place, what he means by saying that a span of three hundred and twenty feet cannot be sustained with piers. The Steubenville bridge is a pier bridge, not a suspension bridge, and that has a span of three hundred and twenty feet. Many other bridges that have a span of three hundred and twenty feet are pier bridges simply. There is no difficulty in combining the suspension and the truss. I happen to have here the plan of the bridge at St. Louis, which is now being constructed, which is a pier bridge with three piers in the river, and each span is five hundred and eighteen feet in length.

Mr. POMEROY. A suspension bridge?

Mr. MORTON. It is a combination of the two, and it turns out not to be more costly than the ordinary truss bridge with a span of three hundred feet.

Mr. POMEROY. I said by combining the two it could be done.

Mr. MORTON. There is no difficulty in the combination. Mr. President, it is true that you cannot build bridges across the Ohio and Mississippi rivers at every point anyhow. There must be favorable ground upon each side, or else you would have to build a bridge right on the surface of the river that would cut off the navigation at once. The ground must be favorable. I do not ask a general law to be passed in regard to the navigation of small rivers, where they employ boats of a small class, and where the tow system is not in use, but I am speaking of two great rivers, the upper Mississippi and the Ohio. It will be found that the character of the two streams is about the same, and that the character of the navigation is about the same, and that a system of bridges which is good for one is good for the other.

Now, Mr. President, I want the committee to examine this whole question. I want them to send for engineers, for persons of skill, and ascertain what can be done to protect the railroad interest and extend it, and at the same time protect the navigation of these great rivers. It is a matter of the first importance to all the northwestern States, and legislation should be brought about before this Congress adjourns. Ten bridges are authorized; the building of some of them is about to commence, and it is important that this action be taken before they commence building those bridges. The injury to the navigation of the upper Mississippi by the bridges already authorized would be incalculable, amounting, in fact, to its destruction. I ask now to have the resolution adopted and the papers referred to the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 1099) for the relief of Wait Talcott;

A bill (H. R. No. 433) for the relief of Palemon John; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1063) for the relief of Henry Barrieklow.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. SUMNER. I now renew my motion, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not. The Senator from Iowa made a motion that Fridays be set aside for the consideration of District business, which, I suppose, is pressing. That was not agreed to; it was objected to; but it shows that there is business to be done. I really hope the Senate will not agree to this motion. I do not see the object of adjourning over Friday and Saturday. We have already had a two days' adjournment over this week.

Mr. SUMNER. I submit it to the vote of the Senate, Mr. President.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT—PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I rise to what I regard a question of privilege. It is one that concerns not only myself equally with every member of this body, but it concerns the Senate itself.

On Saturday last after a vote had been taken in the court of impeachment on the eleventh article, and the members of the House had retired to their own Chamber, one of the managers offered and the House adopted the following resolution:

Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That for the further and more efficient prosecution of the impeachment of the President the managers be directed and instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint sub-committees to take testimony, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

It was advocated by its mover, one of the managers, on the ground that base and corrupt motives had determined the judgment of the Senate; and another one of the managers being asked during a debate on Monday last in the House if he would have Senators perjure themselves, replied that "perjury would not hurt them much."

On Tuesday, the 19th instant, I received the following notice from the managers:

Fortieth Congress United States.
House of Representatives.
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1868.

SIR: A question has arisen in the course of our investigation wherein your testimony will tend to instruct the House of Representatives and aid its inquiry.

Will you do the committee of managers the courtesy to attend at the earliest possible moment at the Judiciary Committee-room of the House, where they are in waiting to receive you.

By direction of the managers.

Your obedient servant, B. D. WHITNEY, Clerk.

Hon. J. B. HENDERSON.

To which I replied as follows—the reply not being delivered, however, till the next morning:

WASHINGTON CITY, May, 1868.

GENTLEMEN: Yours of this date is received. You say "a question has arisen in the course of our investigations wherein your (my) testimony will tend to instruct the House of Representatives and aid its inquiry," and thereupon you request my early attendance before the managers as a witness.

This request, I take it, is intended to answer the purposes of a subpoena, and is issued under authority of a resolution adopted by the House on Saturday last in the following words, to wit:

I have already read the resolution.

A prosecution by impeachment against the President is set on foot, and now when the evidence and arguments have been fully submitted and the Senate as a court is deliberating on its judgment a second prosecution is instituted against the Senate itself.

Whatever may be the purpose of this inquisition—and I use the word in no offensive sense—it is, in my judgment, not only a direct insult to the body of which I am a member, but a proceeding of most dangerous tendency in the future. A large part of our proceedings has been conducted in secret, the managers, counsel, and reporters being excluded. If a member of the court can now, before the rendition of judgment, be withdrawn from consultation and subjected to the inquisition of the prosecutors, that inquisition may reach to all proceedings, and thus subvert the dignity and independence of the Senate. If it be to purge corruption from the Senate, the Senate is the proper body to guard and protect its own honor.

Personally, I have no objection to appearing and testifying before you to all matters within my knowledge on the subject of impeachment. And were I to refuse, I know a new shower of calumny, base and grievous enough already, would certainly be poured upon me. But in my judgment this proceeding rises above personal considerations. It concerns public justice and affects the character, honor, and dignity of the Senate.

I am engaged to appear before another committee of your body to-day, and on the meeting of the Senate to-morrow I shall submit this question for its consideration and be governed accordingly.

Yours, respectfully, J. B. HENDERSON.
To the managers of impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives.

The Senate will observe that I make no objection as an individual to appearing and testifying on any and all matters within my knowledge on this subject of impeachment. If in the midst of the unreasonable and unreasoning excitement heretofore prevailing, but now happily subsiding, I should avail myself of any personal right or privilege to decline or refuse an examination, I am well aware that my refusal would be accepted by many as conclusive evidence of the truth of all imputations contained in every irrelevant or impertinent question that ingenuity could devise. As I have stated in the letter read, the falsehood and calumny heaped upon a few of us in the progress of this proceeding have surely been sufficient to pain our friends and to gratify our worst enemies. For us personally it would be better that the conduct of all Senators from the origin of this proceeding down to its consummation should be subjected to the most thorough examination—even the most inquisitive scrutiny.

So far as I am concerned, it is proper for me in this connection to say that I have already been subjected to this scrutiny. On Monday last a resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives in the following words, to wit:

Whereas the following letter has been written and addressed by seven members of this House to one of the Senators of the United States:

WASHINGTON, May 12, 1868.

SIR: On a consultation of the Republican members of the House of Representatives from Missouri, in view of your position on the impeachment articles, we ask you to withhold your vote on any article upon which you cannot vote affirmatively. This request is made because we believe the safety of the loyal people of the United States demands the immediate removal of Andrew Johnson from the office of President of the United States.

Respectfully,
GEORGE W. ANDERSON,
WILLIAM A. PILE,
C. A. NEWCOMB,
JOSEPH W. McCLURG,
BENJAMIN F. LOAN,
JOHN F. BENJAMIN,
JOSEPH J. GRAVELLY.

Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, United States Senate.

and whereas it is alleged that a combination of the Representatives aforesaid has been entered into to improperly influence the Senator aforesaid in his judgment and decision in the impeachment now pending and undetermined in the Senate: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to investigate all the circumstances connected with the writing of said letter, whether the same was written to corrupt or improperly influence the judgment and decision of said Senator, and to report what action the House ought to take with reference thereto, and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, that they be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and that the committee be instructed to report without unnecessary delay and at any time.

According to notice given I appeared on yesterday before the committee appointed under this resolution, and after stating all the facts connected with the subject-matter of inquiry embraced in its terms, interrogatories were propounded and answered touching conversations and consultations between other Senators and myself on the subject of impeachment. I frankly answered also all questions propounded in reference to the conduct of Chief Justice Chase, the reported organization of a new party, the rumors of new Cabinet appointments, reported presidential pledges of protection to what is foolishly termed Conservative Senators, dinner-table talk with friends, and even my own private opinions.

I disclosed all that I knew on these subjects, and it is, perhaps, enough to say that my knowledge of the facts referred to scarcely extends beyond the every-day rumors of the public press. And I remember now nothing more than I have already stated before one committee. That committee was a lawful committee, appointed for a lawful purpose—the investigation of the conduct of its own members by the House. It is true its duties were confined to that one purpose. Its jurisdiction extended no further. I fully knew my rights when before it, but lest my motives might be misunderstood or impugned I answered fully every question asked, and only entered my protest when the examination had been closed.

I refer to this thing to show that I cannot be actuated by any personal considerations in calling the attention of the Senate to this other extraordinary proceeding. If I were called before the managers I could only repeat what I have already stated, and what I am willing to state anywhere, and what I shall often repeat before those who, at least in my opinion, try with even-handed justice not only Presidents, but Senators and Congressmen.

I object to the present proceeding, first, because it originates under a resolution which in its language is a direct insult to the Senate as a body—an insult which it must now meet and resent or tamely submit in the future to that just contempt and ignominy which must follow from a base surrender of its dignity and its privileges; second, because it assumes control over the conduct of members of the Senate and takes from its custody and jurisdiction, which, in my judgment, is exclusive, an examination into the private character and integrity of its members; and third, it takes from the consultation room, before the conclusion of the trial, a judge and a juror and subjects him to a secret inquisition, not before a committee appointed under the rules of parliamentary law, but before the prosecutors, to testify, perhaps, to what may have transpired in secret session of the Senate and even to what he may have thought and done. If this right be granted the member may be imprisoned for contempt and removed beyond the jurisdiction of the court, thereby depriving him of his right further to consult with his colleagues or to cast his vote on the final decision.

I therefore submit this matter to the Senate, confidently believing the time has come when it should vindicate its own honor and independence as a body as well as the manhood and self-respect of its members. Whatever may be your decision I shall respect it. If the minority of the Senate is to be left thus defenseless we shall submit still further. But if not only our private consultations, but our most secret thoughts are to be scrutinized and dragged before the public under the tortures of an inquisition based on temporary frenzy, harsh and cruel as that which in past days sought the blood of the heretic and dissenter, I shall not murmur. But remember this humiliation once permitted may hereafter visit yourselves. "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." We have differed with the majority in this great proceeding. Against the purity of their motives not one of us is yet so base as to breathe insinuation. We love not the President nor his policy, but we hope we love the country. In our judgment the defeat of this proceeding on the articles, as presented, will yet redound to the honor and glory of that country. If we are mistaken, it is, at least, we trust, an honest delusion, and we cherish it with all the ardor of truthful devotion.

And now, Mr. President, it is my duty to say that since these remarks were prepared a paper from the managers has been placed in my hands, which the Clerk will read, and I will leave this matter entirely with the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 20, 1868.

SIR: The managers have the honor to acknowledge your communication of 19th instant in answer to their request, which was not intended to serve the purpose of a subpoena, but as a courteous intimation to you that you could aid them in the investigation with which they have been charged.

If it had occurred to them to speculate upon the topic they would have supposed you might do them the justice to believe that they would have asked no question indecorous or improper, certainly not as to anything which occurred in the secret sessions of the Senate. They were not aware at the time they sent their note to you that the Senate was in session for "deliberation on its judgment" or otherwise, and they also believed that if they so far transgressed the limits of propriety as to make any inquiry which you deemed improper you would certainly have the efficient remedy of declining to answer.

Accepting the theory of your note, that you are a judge, they do not perceive on that account any objection to your answering as to matters pertinent in a further prosecution of the respondent on trial before the Senate for other and different offenses, because it is well known among lawyers that in both civil and criminal trials the presiding judge may be, and, when occasion requires, is, sworn as a witness in the very case then pending.

Jurors, in like manner, are called from their seats and sworn during the trial; and either, during the adjournment of the court, might legally and properly be called before a grand jury to give evidence on which to find an indictment against the prisoner at the bar for other and different offenses.

They bring these considerations to your notice in order that, seeing the theory upon which they have acted, you will acquit them of any discourtesy either personal to yourself or to the honorable Senate. Without indicating any opinion upon the question whether a Senator is liable to examination as a witness before a committee of the House, they desire to add that they did not intend to assert such claim in their communication to you of 19th instant. They had no purpose other than to avail themselves of your knowledge of facts, if agreeable to you, to give them the benefit of your knowledge, to aid them in pursuit of justice and right.

By direction of the managers.

Your obedient servant,

B. D. WHITNEY, Clerk.

Hon. J. B. HENDERSON.

MR. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

MR. POMEROY. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment to enable me to make a single remark.

MR. CHANDLER. If the Senator will renew it, I will do so.

MR. POMEROY. I will yield the floor to the Senator from Michigan after I have made my remarks, and he can renew it if he desires to do so.

MR. CHANDLER. Very well; I withdraw it.

MR. POMEROY. I desire to say, in a single word, that I received the same kind of invitation from the managers that has been received by the Senator from Missouri. I obeyed it; I gave my testimony; and I did not know that I had been insulted, or that the Senate had been.

MR. SUMNER. I desire to add that though I have not received a formal notice, nor have I been before the managers, I was told by one of the managers that they would expect me to testify to certain matters they understood were within my knowledge. I confess that I had no sensibility on the question. I did not feel that the character of the Senate or my own character was involved because the managers proposed to examine me in order to ferret out corruption.

I also was aware of the rules of the Senate. I have them in my hand, and here is one relating to impeachments:

"If a Senator is called as a witness he shall be sworn and give his testimony standing in his place."

Therefore, by the rules of the Senate, a Senator may be called as a witness.

MR. JOHNSON and MR. HENDERSON. That is in the court.

MR. SUMNER. Very well; I do not follow out the rule. The question raised by the Senator from Missouri is whether, being allowable to be called as a witness in the case, the managers are shut out from those powers—not to say prerogatives—which belong to them with regard to other persons who may be witnesses. I believe that it is usual for them in advance to confer with the witnesses or to examine them in order to ascertain whether it may be desirable to present them as witnesses. In the case which is before us, knowing as we do from public report that it is among the possibilities that a further article of impeachment may be exhibited against the President, it does seem to me a work of superfluity at least, which I cannot comprehend, that any Senator should seek to throw in its way the dignity of the Senate or any claims of its own. Sir, let justice have a free course and take its way. The way of justice cannot be stopped. Technicalities are out of place; they do not belong to a case like this, especially when the managers, through their resolution, have declared to the House the nature of the offense which they seek to ferret out.

MR. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not feel my sensibilities as a Senator at all wounded by the invitation which is sent to the Senator from Missouri. But a suggestion fell from the Senator from Kentucky [MR. DAVIS] some time since, and a resolution was submitted upon it, which interests me. I conceive that the managers of the House of Representatives may invite any Senator before them for the purpose of getting information, or call on him, or a committee of the House perhaps might subpoena him as a witness, and yet not touch the honor of the Senate. The Senator from Kentucky has made a suggestion of a different kind. He has offered a resolution by which he proposes to ascertain the truth or the falsity of such a statement, and that resolution I should be glad to see the Senate take up and adopt, and give him the committee and enable him to give us and the country and the world, if the world care to listen, the facts; and so I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, now lying on the table.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolution mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there is reason to believe that some persons have been, and are, engaged in violating the rights and privileges of the Senate by the use of threats, intimidation, and other unlawful and improper means toward its members to constrain them in their consideration, action, and judgment in the matter of the articles of impeachment against the President of the United States, now pending before the Senate as a court of impeachment; Therefore, Be it resolved, That a committee of three, to be chosen by the Senate, do proceed to inquire into the facts of such imputed threats, intimidation, and other unlawful and improper means aforesaid, and the names of the persons, if any, using, or that have used, them; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to take evidence, employ a stenographer, and report the facts to the Senate.

MR. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Kentucky whether it would not be better to strike out the words "to be chosen by the Senate," and to substitute the words "to be appointed by the Chair," in the ordinary way.

MR. DAVIS. I have no objection to that modification of the resolution, and will so modify it.

MR. SUMNER. I hope the resolution will pass; and I hope the committee appointed by the Chair—it is three, I believe—will be three Senators.

MR. JOHNSON. That is for the Chair to decide.

MR. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

MR. JOHNSON. That is for the Chair to decide.

MR. SUMNER. The Senator will excuse me. I am expressing an opinion in advance. I hope that they may be three Senators who are already on the record as having voted "not guilty" for the President of the United States.

MR. FESSENDEN. The Chair receives its instructions now, and I suppose will obey them!

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Chair will.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall not vote against the resolution; but, so far as my knowledge extends, the recitation that precedes the resolution is not true. There may be reason to believe this; but I know of no such reason. I know of no fact that justifies such an allegation. I do remember, it is true, that the attorneys for the President threatened Senators, as I thought, with the fate of the accusers of Daniel, if they should vote against the President; but I supposed that that was a mere flourish of rhetoric. I did not believe that they intended really to have us thrown into a lion's den or afflicted in any such severe manner if on our consciences we should vote differently from their judgment of what was required by the law and the testimony. There may have been such loose remarks as these dropped by gentlemen outside of this prosecution and outside of the Senate Chamber; but that anybody has seriously attempted to intimidate a Senator I do not believe. I cannot believe it from any facts that have come to my knowledge. Therefore I hope that the language used in the preamble of the resolution will be modified.

Mr. DRAKE. I take it for granted that the honorable Senator from Kentucky does not expect the Senate to adopt this resolution with the preamble affirming that there is good reason to believe this thing, unless he first states to us the grounds upon which he desires the Senate to affirm that fact. It may be that the honorable Senator from Kentucky knows matters which, when he comes to state them to the Senate, may induce the Senate to adopt the resolution with the preamble as it is. Of course it is the privilege of the Senator from Kentucky to sustain his resolution and to state his knowledge to the Senate, and then we shall be able to judge whether we ought to adopt the resolution with that preamble.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to a change of the phraseology of the preamble or of the resolution itself, or that it should have no preamble. However, on the suggestion of gentlemen, I will ask leave to modify the preamble so as to read, "Whereas it is represented that," instead of "Whereas there is reason to believe that." I suppose that will be satisfactory.

Mr. HARLAN. That would be satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The preamble to the resolution will be so modified.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a single word in relation to that resolution. It is a mere resolution of inquiry; and if it should turn out upon investigation that there is no foundation whatever for it I shall certainly be very much gratified. I trust there is none. In offering the resolution it was not expected by me that I should be a member of the committee. I do not desire to be a member of that committee. I do not think that I ought to be, having presented the resolution; and I trust that the President of the Senate will appoint some other gentleman who could more fitly serve upon the committee and with more ability than myself. I trust that the Chair will receive the suggestion that I now make in the earnest spirit in which it is made, and will not think of appointing me a member of that committee.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I regret the introduction of this resolution at this time. I regret the adoption by the House of Representatives of the resolution which was read by the Senator from Missouri. I cannot but feel that the preamble to that resolution is in derogation of the privileges of the Senate, because that preamble sets forth distinctly that there is probable cause to believe that evil or corrupt influences have been employed to affect the action of the Senate in its judgment upon articles of impeachment preferred before it; and it is my opinion that if the managers of the impeachment had any facts warranting an allegation of that kind in the preamble of a resolution of inquiry they should have been submitted to the Senate, and the Senate called upon to preserve its own purity and dignity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend from Connecticut permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose the fact the managers had ascertained to have been that some official of the Government, a person subject to impeachment, had approached Senators with offers of bribes which the Senators refused to receive, would it not have been proper for the House of Representatives to make an inquiry with a view to the punishment of these persons?

Mr. FERRY. Then I think it would have been proper for the House of Representatives to pass a resolution of inquiry setting forth the fact that an officer of the Government had attempted to commit an impeachable offense. But this resolution is a declaration that the Senate has been controlled by corrupt motives and corrupt influences.

Several SENATORS. No! no!

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all.

Mr. FERRY. I ask for the reading of the preamble to the resolution which was read by the Senator from Missouri. Let us see what the preamble is.

Mr. HENDERSON. I gave the letter to the reporter. The reporter has it.

Mr. FERRY. The preamble to that resolution states that there is probable cause to believe that corrupt influences have operated upon the Senate. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. HENDERSON. Influenced the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Have been used to influence." That is the language, I think.

Mr. CONKLING. The words are, "have been employed to influence the determination of the Senate"—that they have been employed, not that they have been effectuated.

Mr. SUMNER. "Used" is the word.

Mr. FERRY. Well, sir, it seems to me to be a distinction without a difference. I do think, and have thought from the beginning, that if probable cause for such a charge as that existed it should have been brought to the knowledge of the Senate, and the Senate left to act upon it; and I must say that I, as a Senator, had I been requested, with the utmost courtesy, to appear before the managers of the impeachment upon a resolution based on such a preamble as that, should have felt it my duty as a Senator not to comply with the request. Now, sir, we have before us, in the midst of the trial of an impeachment, before the final vote has been taken upon the great mass of the articles of impeachment, an inquiry as to influences or intimidations or menaces which it is represented have been employed to influence the votes of Senators.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator know of any constitutional method by which the Senate can direct the action of the House of Representatives or prevent them from attending to any branch of business they see fit?

Mr. FERRY. None whatever; but I do know that the House cannot constitutionally trench upon the privileges of the Senate; and I do regard the resolution referred to by the Senator from Missouri, under the preamble of that resolution, as trenching upon the privileges of the Senate. Other Senators differ from me. Such is my view of the character of that resolution.

Now, sir, the court of impeachment has adjourned until Tuesday next. We all expect and hope that on that day the final determination of that cause will be made by this body; and after such final determination, it seems to me, the appropriate time will come, if ever, for such an investigation as is proposed by the resolution before us. But, sir, ought we, upon the resolution before us as it now stands, and at this time, or at any time, indeed, to appoint such a committee? It is represented that certain means have been used? By whom? Are we, every time that a partisan newspaper casts imputation upon the action of the Senate, to appoint a committee of investigation to inquire into the truth of such imputations? All that there is before us now is an averment in the preamble to this resolution of inquiry that "it is represented" that certain things have taken place.

But, sir, my main objection is to proceeding with resolutions of this kind at all until the trial has been brought to an end so far as the articles of impeachment which are now pending before us are concerned. Let us finish that trial, record our judgment, and then if Senators have brought to their knowledge any substantial facts upon which a resolution of inquiry ought to be based, let us preserve the purity and dignity of the Senate by an appropriate investigation; but I dislike exceedingly the interpolation of inquiries of this kind in the midst of the trial, and when we are only awaiting the day to pronounce our final judgment.

With these views, in order, at any rate, that my vote may be recorded in accordance with my views on this subject, I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to this day week.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the great question, if there is any great question about this matter, is, what does the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, or said to have been adopted there, (because we have no official information on the subject, the House has not communicated to us any such information and we have not asked any,) mean? When it was introduced into this body three or four days ago I exhausted the small amount of parliamentary ingenuity that I possessed to exclude it from consideration here, because it appeared to me to be a new thing in the line of courtesy, as well as legislation, for us to be reviewing any resolution that the House of Representatives had adopted in respect to the government of its own affairs and the instruction of its own committees, at least until we should have sent to that body and invited them to send us a copy of it, if we thought, unofficially, that it infringed our privileges. But I was not successful; and, therefore, by the order of the Senate, acting through the Chair, the resolution was spread upon our records; and now that we have it here the question is, what does it mean?

My friend from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] supposes it to mean a reflection upon Senators, and as having for its object some proceeding against Senators. If my friend is right about that, I should agree with him entirely in the conclusions to which he comes. If, on the other hand, it means only that the House of Representatives have reason to believe that the very person who is being tried has been using means to influence (not successfully, necessarily, by any means) the determination of the Senate, then I say that it is a perfectly proper subject for the House of Representatives to inquire into in this very impeachment; and if they discover that the President of the United States, or any agent of his, has even approached a Senator improperly, to file another article and try the question before the Senate again, whether that is within the constitutional prerogatives of the President of the United States. I take it, no Senator will disagree with me, if that is the fair meaning of the investigation that the House of Representatives set on foot. Now let us see whether it is or not. Here it is:

Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That for the further and more efficient prosecution of the impeachment of the President the managers be directed and instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint sub-committees to take testimony, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Now, can any true, intelligent men, taking that resolution all together, differ fairly as to what its scope and purport are? It begins, as I have said, by a simple recital that there is some reason to believe that—

Mr. DRAKE. That it "seems to them."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but I put it in the strongest light, that improper or corrupt means have been made use of—"used," in the language of the resolution—to produce an influence. The House of Representatives, in the preamble taken alone, do not undertake to hint that these means have produced an influence; but is any Senator so ignorant of law or of history or of common sense as not to know that the use of means frequently happens without producing the result desired? If so, we must have all lived in vain, because there is not one of us, I take it, who has not in the course of his lifetime—I was about to say every day—made attempts and efforts to accomplish something that utterly and totally failed; and of course we can make no attempt unless we employ means, as my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] very properly suggests.

And if that were open to doubt by any refinement of criticism the body of the resolution explains itself. It says on account of this information the managers are authorized, for the further prosecution of the impeachment against the President, to send for these witnesses and ascertain these facts; and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] says that it was explained in debate; but no matter for that. I am not accustomed to look to debates much to ascertain what the meaning of resolutions and bills is. It does not need any explanation. It explains itself upon the face of it. All that preamble is, like every other preamble, the mere inducement to that which the House order and direct, and from that inducement they think it wise to instruct the managers to make further inquiry. Against whom? Against the President of the United States, the person against whom this impeachment is now depending, and to summon witnesses and examine them for the purpose of prosecuting an impeachment that is now pending.

How is any Senator, I should be glad to know, to torture that into an attack upon the privileges of the Senate, to torture that into bringing into accusation any Senator? Is it within the privileges of a Senator to be so absolutely wrapped up in the majesty of this body as to be incapable of telling the truth? Is there any constitutional privilege that belongs to this body that should seal the mouths of its members, if they know any truth which relates to the impeachment? I do not know of any. Possibly, as this trial develops, we may discover some; but I think not.

Where, then, is this great difficulty? The House of Representatives have said, it seems, to their own committee that there is some reason to suspect that improper and corrupt influences have been resorted to, in order to produce a result that has not yet been produced, and therefore, looking to the party from whom they suspect these improper and corrupt influences have emanated, they instruct their agents to inquire as to his further prosecution, and to summon witnesses to attend before them for that purpose. Has my friend from Missouri any privilege to refuse an invitation of that kind? Is there anything, as I said before, in the constitution of this body which should seal his mouth, if he had been one of the objects of that influence? Of course I know he would spurn it.

I beg him and I beg Senators not to suppose that I have the remotest suspicion that he has been tainted or soiled in the slightest degree. But if any agent of the President has come to him and offered him improper or corrupt reasons for voting one way or another, have not the House of Representatives the right to know that as well as us? The Constitution has committed to them the power to originate impeachments and to us to try them; and if any agent of the President has not done this thing, is there any harm in my friend from Missouri saying so? And his word would settle the question.

Wherefore, then, is it, Mr. President, that we have this large degree of sensitiveness and unhappiness that seems to be produced among us at this simple fact that, for the further prosecution of a case that the Constitution and laws permit them to prosecute, the House of Representatives have thought fit to authorize their agents to send for witnesses, persons, and papers, and those agents, in the discharge of that duty, have thought it right and reasonable to address a respectful application to Senators to come and state before them if they know anything about it; and that is the whole of the story. I do not regard that as an insult to this body. I do not regard it as any reflection upon this body. Of course as to what its prospects are, what its foundation is, I have no knowledge, information, or belief. I reserve all that. But as to the simple proposition that the House of Representatives have thought fit in their own way to make further inquiry into the conduct of the President of the United States, I think they have a perfect right to do it as a matter of taste as well as a matter of constitutional law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the only propriety of this resolution presented by the Senator from Kentucky lies in the fact that the House of Representatives has adopted the other resolution, and that its managers are proceeding under it to call members of the Senate before them, and, besides that, also to investigate directly the conduct of particular members of this body. The Senator from Vermont may expend the whole of his ingenuity upon the face of the resolution adopted by the House, and may, as an adroit and astute lawyer, as we know he is, endeavor to convince us, against the plain facts of the case, that the House are in no way and in no sense intending to touch upon the Senate or upon any of its members. But, sir, he will lose his labor. The facts are plainly against him from the beginning of this very singular transaction of the House of Representatives down to the present moment, and the facts which have transpired to the public as well as to the members of the Senate give them as well as us complete information on this point.

Now, sir, the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky will announce to the House of Representatives and to the public that the Senate itself will investigate and examine matters relating to the conduct of its members or to the attempt to apply influence to them. It is an enunciation that, in view of what has been done by the House and by the managers of the House, the Senate proposes to take this matter in charge and look into it; and if there be any occasion for any investigation whatever the proper tribunal shall undertake it, under those assurances of propriety and those guarantees of power which ought to surround and accompany any investigation of this kind, in which character is involved, in which the administration of public justice is involved, in which the position and dignity of one of the two branches of Congress is involved.

It is only with reference to considerations of this kind that I bring my mind to the point of voting for the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. If these matters out of which proceedings have arisen rested merely in newspaper correspondence, in the loose and thoughtless and reckless assertions of men who write what we do, and sometimes what we do not do, I should be very much averse to adopting a resolution to dignify out-door, vague, uncertain, unauthentic, uncorroborated reports by leveling against them a resolution of this body. But, sir, the associate branch of Congress itself has moved; it has declared in the face of this nation that its managers have information which constitutes probable cause for believing that corrupt influences have been used—not purposed, not intended merely; but used to influence the decision of the Senate upon the trial of impeachment. Therefore, say the House, the managers are authorized, in secret, by their whole number and by sub-committees down to one of their number, in private, employing the whole power of the House, to call anybody before them and to explore this question of the use of corrupt means upon members of the Senate. The object also is announced; and what is that? That the managers may further and successfully prosecute the impeachment. What impeachment? The one pending before the Senate and about to be decided by it—not some future impeachment hereafter brought. There is no reference to that in the resolution, although there is a reference to it here in debate in order to get away, I suppose, from the pinch of the argument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will excuse me, I made no reference to any future impeachment. An impeachment is one thing; and if my friend is acquainted with parliamentary proceedings, as he is, he knows it is perfectly competent for an impeaching body to file additional articles at any time before the impeachment is disposed of.

Mr. BUCKALEW. An impeachment may be single or double. I am not going into nice discriminations of that sort, because if I get upon points of technicality I shall be sure to be worsted by my friend from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will, if you are not right, clearly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now, then, Mr. President, this resolution thus adopted by the House, and bearing the character which I have assigned it, is the foundation of the proceedings now going on. The public papers announce to us that the managers have called witness after witness and asked them all the questions that could possibly be asked in the investigation of a criminal before them for trial, and applied it all to a member of this body. They have inquired about what he has done; where he has been; who have called upon him; who have conversed with him; entire conversations in which he was one party and the witness another. They have asked directly all those questions which point to a corrupt use of money. Ay, and I understand they have gone into the banks of Washington to ascertain how the accounts of witnesses stand there, all leveled and directed to the one purpose. Why? The whole country understands it, and we understand it, and it is idle to get away from it upon any technical suggestions such as those which have been submitted to us by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. President, I think after the adjournment of the court of impeachment, it would have been a wise thing for the two Houses of Congress to adjourn also; because it was inevitable that if they remained in session this subject of impeachment would intrude itself into both Houses constantly, and that nothing else could be done; no general or public business could be transacted. I am very sorry indeed that the two Houses did not adjourn, and that all these matters, which are only, after all, productive of scandal and mischief in the country, could not have been avoided; that we should have heard nothing of impeachment in the legislative session of the Senate until the final judgment was pronounced.

The only practical point that I desired to be heard upon or that I intended to speak upon this morning, was this, after hearing the statement of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate, in view of what has taken place, should adopt a resolution which should give directions to its own members and should express its own opinion upon this proceeding by the managers of the House. Whether the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky be adopted or not, I think we ought to adopt a resolution directed to that end. We ought to say, and to declare now once for all, whether the members of the Senate are to be taken before the managers or a committee of the House, and examined with reference to anything which concerns the impeachment; whether the Senate considers that its privileges extend to the entire immunity of its own members pending this trial. If we do not do that, we cannot foresee what will take place hereafter. It seems that two members of the Senate at least have already been examined by the managers of the House on some matters relating to impeachment:

Mr. POMEROY. Only one.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was examined by another committee, and not before the managers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was a personal question between the Senator from Missouri and his colleagues from that State.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was examined upon everything that I could imagine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am speaking of what the committee were authorized to do. Of course I do not know what happened when my friend and his colleagues were together.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now, if this resolution be adopted this morning it will not necessarily follow that this committee will make any report before the impeachment is over. It would, perhaps, be improper that they should throw in a report on these matters to disturb us before we take our final vote upon the articles of impeachment; but I see no objection to forming the committee now and enabling them to go on, so that they shall be able to report to us at an early date after the final vote is taken.

Mr. President, if this resolution be adopted, or whether it is adopted or not, I shall offer a resolution based upon the statement made this morning by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the resolution before the Senate is not the one sent here from the House of Representatives. The resolution which is pending is the one offered by the Senator from Kentucky. That is the one that will pass, if any passes just now. The one under debate seems to be the one sent here some days ago from the House of Representatives. I have been interested in the course of the debate because I had resolved in my own mind, if the Senate should adopt the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, that I would then ask the Senate to consider and adopt, or refuse compliance with, the request made by the House of Representatives. First, I wished to have the Senate pass upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, because I thought that resolution more intimately concerned us all. That contained a direct suggestion that improper influences or means were being employed to intimidate the Senate in its action upon a grave question not yet disposed of by the Senate. It comes from a single Senator, but he is a Senator, and therefore I thought it concerned us to know the facts, to know the truth about it.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] suggests that this is too early to consider it; it had better be postponed; the trial is yet undisposed of; the final judgment is not pronounced; and, therefore, we had better not take up this inquiry. Sir, I know of no time so fit to meet an assault upon my character as the time when it is made; and if it be believed by anybody that efforts are being made to intimidate the Senate it is a suggestion which reflects upon my character and upon the character of my friend from Connecticut, and upon all of us. I do not understand that the inquiry asked for here is directed against any individual of the Senate; but it is an inquiry to determine whether such means are being employed or not. So I want to know how the fact is in reference to that as much as the Senator from Kentucky or anybody else; and, animated by that desire, I hope the Senate will agree to this resolution; and then I hope that the Senate will either consent to answer the request made by the House of Representatives the other day or refuse to grant that request. That request comes to us from a coordinate branch of the Congress of the United States. It is couched in respectful terms. It does not tell us what disposition it proposes to make of the evidence it seeks. It simply asks to be furnished with a certified copy of two days' proceedings of the tribunal sitting for the trial of the impeachment of the President; and the Senate must meet that request, either comply with it or refuse it.

To stimulate the Senate to a refusal a newspaper is brought in here and a debate and certain proceedings had in that House are read, from which I gather that the House of Representatives have made some suggestions similar to those made by the Senator from Kentucky, and they want light equally with the Senator from Kentucky; and I know of nothing in the Constitution of the United States which forbids the House of Representatives from seeking light in any way that any other body or agent or officer of the Government may seek it. They are seeking light, and because they have professed in a resolution their want of light, that profession is construed into an attack upon the whole Senate. They do not say that they have information which involves the character of any Senator. But I think it is almost too late in the experience of the Government for the Senate to hold itself responsible for the character or the conduct of any individual; and if the House had therefore directed its purposed inquiry against any individual of the Senate, if it had been myself, I should be the last man to want the Senate to stand forward for my protection. If I cannot defend my own character, I know the Senate cannot do it.

But it is suggested that we ought to monopolize this privilege of investigating the characters of our own members. Mr. President, I do not like monopolies anyway, and I am less ambitious of that particular monopoly than any I ever heard. If anybody in God's universe knows anything more of our conduct than I do myself, I wish them joy of it; and if they can make any profitable use of it, I hope they will. I know of nothing just now touching the conduct of individuals of the Senate or of the Senate itself of which I could make any use that I suppose would be particularly advantageous to the country. I want this resolution adopted, and I want the Senate then to acquiesce in the request made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. President, I do not know that it is now in order to offer an amendment to the resolution pending; but if so, I wish to offer one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order to amend the resolution.

Mr. ROSS. Then I move to amend it by adding:

And that the board of managers on the part of the House be requested to furnish to said committee a transcript of all testimony that has been or may be taken by them in the case of the impeachment of the President.

I hope the amendment will be adopted, and that the resolution will pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That request should be addressed to the House of Representatives, I take it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition of the Senator from Kansas is not germane to the resolution. Such a request would have to go to the House of Representatives. The original proposition is a Senate resolution. I do not think they can be joined together. They are independent.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the honorable member from Kansas offers this as an amendment to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it offered as a substitute?

Mr. ROSS. It is designed as an amendment to the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, as an addition to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I supposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the proposition of the Senator from Kansas may be substituted for the original resolution, if that should be the desire of the Senate; but it is not germane as an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original resolution will be read, and also the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The original resolution reads as follows:

Whereas it is represented that some persons have been and are engaged in violating the rights and privileges of the Senate by the use of threats, intimidation, and other unlawful and improper means toward its members to constrain them in their consideration, action, and judgment in the matter of the articles of impeachment against the President of the United States now pending before the Senate as a court of impeachment: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of three, to be appointed by the Chair, do proceed to inquire into the facts of such imputed threats, intimidation, and other unlawful means aforesaid, and the names of the persons, if any, using, or that have used, them; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to take evidence, employ a stenographer, and report the facts to the Senate.

It is proposed to add to the resolution the following:

And that the board of managers on the part of the House be requested to furnish to said committee a transcript of all the testimony that has been or may be taken by them in the case of the impeachment of the President.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator proceeds let us ascertain whether that amendment is considered in order or not. I do not know what the ruling of the Chair was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment might be in order if modified so as to provide that the committee be authorized to request the House, &c.

Mr. ROSS. I will make that modification. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator so modify his amendment?

Mr. ROSS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, in the opinion of the Chair, it will be in order. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I submit the question whether a committee of the Senate can address a request to the House of Representatives; whether it ought not to come from the Senate?

Mr. SUMNER. Of course it must.

Mr. JOHNSON. They can request it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All the committee will have to do will be to communicate that resolution, if passed, to the managers, and they will understand it.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the amendment read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And that said committee be authorized to request the board of managers on the part of the House to furnish said committee a transcript of all the testimony that has been or may be taken by them in the case of the impeachment of the President.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest that the words "board of" be omitted, so as to say "the managers" simply.

Mr. ROSS. I accept that modification.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, as I understand this matter, I am opposed to the resolution and to any proceedings upon the subject, or the cognate subject, at the present time. In the first place, it occurs to me that the grounds for this resolution, as I have heard them stated, are too slight to challenge the action of the Senate. As the resolution now stands it says, "it has been represented"—and the Senator from Kentucky rises here and says it has been represented—that certain things have been done or attempted to be done. Represented by whom? Who has represented that certain persons have attempted to do certain things we are not informed. The honorable Senator from Kentucky does not inform us who represents these things, whether they are parties inside or outside, parties of responsibility or of no responsibility. Sir, it is new to me that it can properly be the foundation of proceedings in the Senate of the United States that somebody, somewhere, may have said certain things, and it is consequently the duty of the Senate of the United States to rush into an inquiry as to the truth of these representations.

As the resolution stands it is a simple recital that it has been represented that certain things have been done or attempted. That is all there is of it. What are the grounds of the belief of the Senator from Kentucky? If the Senator from Kentucky will say that he has examined this question and has reason to believe, and does believe, that certain persons have been engaged as is supposed in this resolution, that will present another question altogether. If my honorable friend will rise in his place and say that he has given this subject consideration; that he has heard representations of this character from persons of high respectability and standing, and believes, or has reason to believe, in their truth, then I think he will have gone far enough to lay the foundation for an examination. But I object altogether to the adoption of a resolution which has no other foundation than a representation, which representation has no local habitation; or, in other words, cannot be traced to any responsible source. It seems to me that it does not become the character or the dignity of the Senate to start off on an examination into charges resting upon that foundation. I speak of the resolution as it stands, as the Senator from Kentucky chooses to leave it. For that reason I am opposed to the adoption of the resolution at the present time.

It is hardly worth while, perhaps, to notice what is said to have been accomplished or attempted to be accomplished by other parties. But the resolution then proceeds to say that "some persons"—what persons? Who? Where? Inside or outside of the Senate Chamber? In the city or elsewhere? "Some persons have been, and are," at the present time, "engaged"—in what?—"engaged in violating the rights and privileges of the Senate by the use of threats," &c. Of course, that would be an offense. If that were so, and if the Senator from Kentucky has reasonable grounds to believe that it is so of his own knowledge, or it has come to his knowledge so that as matter of belief he thinks that state of things exists, then I agree it is a proper matter for inquiry; but as at present advised, it seems to me, it would be very likely to turn out, after all, that these representations could be traced to no reliable source whatever, and it would end in a fruitless investigation.

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask, if it should turn out just as he suggests, which I am very much inclined to think will be the case, which I earnestly hope will be the case, and believe will be the case, what then?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then the Senate would have been engaged in what turned out to be a fruitless inquiry, and upon representations which had no foundation, and which, as I said, ought not to put us upon the inquiry.

Now, Mr. President, what I am saying is connected with some other things that have been said here, about which I wish to make a remark or two. I deprecate altogether the personal sensitiveness which has been exhibited here this morning by my very esteemed friend who sits near me, [Mr. HENDERSON.] He makes use of language here which I do not think particularly well guarded in his explanation this morning. He says that there has been in the country a great deal of unreasoning and unreasonable criticism of the Senate of the United States. I do not use his precise phraseology, but that was the idea. That may be so; it is not unlikely that it is so; but is that a question of privilege? Are we to rise here in our places, one after another, until the whole fifty-four Senators have paid their personal respects to this unreasonable and unreasoning sentiment supposed to obtain in the country?

The Senator from Missouri seems to think that he above all others has been the peculiar object of this assault and attack. I do not so understand it. I do not understand that that is the case at all. Does he not know that he has been lauded and commended for his course throughout the country in certain quarters? Does he not know of that vindication of his opinions, his sentiments, and his position? Does he not know, also, that other Senators who took different views of this subject have been subjected to as fierce denunciation as he, or those with whom he stands? Does he think it is at all peculiar to him and the dissenting Senators here to be assailed? And by "dissenting" I mean simply those who differ with the majority. If the majority of this court are supposed to stand in the same relation that the majority in any other court do, then we are supposed to give the opinion, or should have been, if it had not failed, while the minority would have been the dissenting Senators.

No, sir; the fiercest and bitterest denunciations have fallen, not alone, to say the least of it, upon the minority, but upon the majority, who have been denounced here from the beginning to the end of the session in language (to use the term which has been applied to what has been said outside) unreasoning and unreasonable.

That is the way we stand, all of us here, standing on our opinions, on our convictions, on our consciences, and on the opinions that we choose to send to the country. We must abide by them; and that is the only remedy we have. Investigations by committees will not help us; and in my judgment they are uncalled for so far as I have seen, so far as I have had any evidence. We had better be self-possessed and composed and attend to the duties of the session and allow these criticisms upon us, unless it should turn out as the honorable Senator from Kentucky seems to have intimated, although from his entire reticence on the subject I very shrewdly suspect he has not a great deal of evidence on the subject. If he will say that he has good grounds to believe, and does believe that there are evil disposed persons who are using efforts to intimidate Senators, then certainly I am perfectly free to vote for the resolution; but otherwise, for the reasons I have stated in a general way, I should be disinclined to do it.

Mr. DAVIS. I was very much struck by a suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] that the imputations pro and con in relation to this matter against Senators were a proper subject for the investigation of the Senate, and that the fittest time to make that investigation would be when the trial of the articles of impeachment was over. I was struck with the good sense and the propriety of that suggestion. For myself I never would have thought of violating that course of procedure if it had not been for the manner in which the Senate has been presented by the extraordinary course of the House of Representatives.

Now, in response to the honorable Senator from Maine, I will make simply this suggestion: I believe that the intimidations referred to in the preamble have been attempted; I believe they are still continued; and I believe they can be established by an investigation by the committee proposed to be raised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I think I shall follow out practically the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky and also of the Senator from Connecticut, if after this discussion, at this stage, I move an adjournment. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator desires it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I only desire to say a few words.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the honorable member from Wisconsin, by a remark which fell from him, although I take it for granted he did not intend it, could be construed as intimating that the honorable member from Missouri was exceedingly unwilling to be examined by the House of Representatives or any of its committees. He could not have heard what that member said. He stated, as the Senate will recollect—

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me a word of explanation?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I can only say that I had not, while I was speaking, the honorable Senator from Missouri in my mind one single moment as far as I remember. I did not make use of a word that had any reference to him—that I intended to have any reference to him. I was speaking in reference to the two resolutions, the one offered by the Senator from Kentucky and the resolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON. I said, knowing the honorable member so well, that I was sure he had no such intention; but what he did say was calculated, if not explained, to make the impression upon the country that the member from Missouri was apprehensive of some unfavorable result to him, and that he wished to place between himself and those who were seeking to examine him the defense of the Senate. He told us, and of course we know it to be true, that although the committee before whom he appeared yesterday had no authority whatever by the resolution under which they were organized to make such inquiries as they did make of him relative to the impeachment, he answered them all, at once and frankly. He unbosomed himself, as far as he had anything to disclose in relation to the impeachment and his course in regard to it. He protested after having done so, not before, against the power of the committee to conduct him through such an examination. It is not, therefore, from any fear on his part that the public shall know, either by him or by others, what has been his conduct on this impeachment. We who know him in this Chamber know—and I hope he will pardon me for saying it as he is present—that he is incapable of acting from any other than a fair, honest, and patriotic motive. Now, Mr. President, what he desires—and that is all that he has done—is to place himself in the hands of the Senate as regards his obligation, or the propriety of his complying with the request made by the managers of the impeachment.

The honorable member from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] seem to suppose that that inquiry is not intended to assail any member of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which inquiry are you alluding to?

Mr. JOHNSON. By the managers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know which you were alluding to, as you had been speaking of the other committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I know, Mr. President, what are the legitimate conclusions to be drawn from facts as to which there is no controversy, that is the sole purpose. Now, what are the facts? On Saturday, somewhere, I believe, between the hours of three and four, a vote was taken in the court of impeachment upon the last of the series of articles, and it was rejected by a constitutional majority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A constitutional minority!

Mr. JOHNSON. A constitutional vote, which is a constitutional majority. The moment it was done a proposition was made by my friend from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] to postpone the further consideration of the case as it stood until the 26th of the month, and that motion prevailed. The managers and the House retired, and as soon as they reassembled in their own Chamber the resolution was offered which is now the subject of debate. What did it mean? What was the reason for offering it? It meant to say that the judgment of the Senate, from some cause or other, upon the eleventh article, had been brought about by corrupt or improper influences.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exercised by whom?

Mr. JOHNSON. Exercised by somebody, no matter by whom. The honorable member seems to suppose that all they meant or all they may have meant was that it was by the President of the United States. Why did not they say so?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They did in the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. They have not said any such thing, begging my friend's pardon. They have said nothing like it.

Mr. FOWLER. Nothing like it.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; nothing at all like it. What they do say—if they mean what their words imply—is that the judgment which the Senate had then pronounced on the eleventh article had been brought about by corrupt influences.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do they not point out by whom they think that had been brought about, if that is the meaning of it?

Mr. JOHNSON. No. By whom? Not by officers, not by the President, but leaving it in the general; or no matter by whom, whether President or officers, what they meant to say was, and what they have said is, that the judgment was brought about by the corruption of some Senator. Now, the honorable member supposes that because the resolution proceeds to state that an investigation ought to be conducted with a view to the more efficient prosecution of the impeachment, all that they meant was that they wished to see whether they could obtain at the hands of the House and present to the Senate an additional article. There is not a word of the kind in the resolution. It is true that the House may, at any time before final judgment, present additional articles of impeachment; but that, if the resolution is to be understood in its ordinary sense, is not the purpose. It is to make effectual the impeachment then pending; in other words, if they can prove that any of the nineteen who voted against the eleventh article, one or more, was corrupted, to insist upon their expulsion from this Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would you not vote for it?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly I would; unquestionably I would; but that is not the inquiry with them. That is a business which concerns our own honor; and I never can agree that the Senate of the United States, pending a trial, should permit, if it has the power to prevent, any of its body proceeding before these managers or the House of Representatives for the purpose of assailing any members of the court. It is a matter with which the House has nothing to do. They cannot impeach a Senator. That was decided in the beginning of the Government in the case of Blount. They desire, therefore, evidently to impeach the honor of some of the individual members of this body, and they seek to accomplish their object by forcing before them, if they can do it, the members of the body itself. Why is the honorable member from Missouri summoned, or requested in the nature of a subpoena, to appear before them? He was one of the nineteen. He was one who might have been corrupted; he was one who might have been embraced within the information upon the authority of which the House passed the resolution; and they seek to bring him before them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, if the honorable Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him upon what assumption it is, or what reasoning it is, or what facts stated, he assumes that the investigation relates to the nineteen other than the majority?

Mr. JOHNSON. For this very plain reason: I do not suppose the managers desired to prove that the majority had not voted from honest motives; it was not their vote that defeated the impeachment; it was the vote of the nineteen; and the burden of their complaint is that the impeachment was defeated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the general charge is one of corruption. Certainly that might apply as well to one class of Senators as another.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not at all, if the honorable member will think for a moment. The charge is that the impeachment had been a failure because of the corruption of the members. My friend and those who voted with him, having voted in favor of the eleventh article, certainly never could have been contemplated by that resolution.

Now, Mr. President, there is another thing. What do they want with the certified or authenticated copy of our proceedings for the two last days of the court? Evidently to get authentic evidence of the vote, and for nothing else. They knew what the vote in fact was, but they desired to have such testimony before them as could be the foundation of some proceedings against any Senator whom they might be able to involve through the instrumentality of perjured or other testimony.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to call his attention to what I believe is contained in the letter read by my friend from Missouri from the managers themselves to him, in which (although I have not got it before me) I understood them to state that they wanted his evidence with a view to the further prosecution of the impeachment against the President?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would not that fairly imply the exhibition of an additional article accusing him of an attempt to bribe?

Mr. JOHNSON. Not at all, necessarily; but that they do not say in the resolution. I am speaking now of the resolution. What effect the letter of the honorable member from Missouri may have had upon the managers it is not for me to inquire. When the House passed the resolution, what they designed was to make effectual the then articles of impeachment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But you were attempting to make that out by extrinsic evidence derived from other circumstances.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now before us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you do that you should refer to the other evidence also, in which they expressly state that they have no such purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. That is an afterthought.

Mr. JOHNSON. Evidently I do not mean an afterthought on the part of the member from Vermont, but an afterthought on the part of others. My friend, the member from Kansas, [Mr. Ross,] offered an amendment to the resolution proposed by the member from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] I hope it will be adopted. If it is, and we get the evidence taken before the managers, we shall then see what were the questions that they propounded to his colleague from Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. I can give that myself.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt you would give it. I suspect that there was nothing in that evidence touching the President. I suspect there was nothing in that evidence implicating any officer of the Government. I suspect, although I am sure the honorable member would be the last to involve his colleague, that they sought, through the instrumentality of his evidence, to involve that colleague. And now what appears in the public press? for we have a right to refer to it. What examination have they been conducting? One of them, it is said, has been spending hours and hours in one of the banks of this city for the purpose of ascertaining the accounts of some of the depositors. What for? It is answered by the character of the examination which they are said to have made upon the authority of that first examination. To prove that money was used. Used how? Used to what end? Used to corrupt somebody. Who? Some one or more of the nineteen. The telegraph offices (judging from the same public rumor) have been searched and all the dispatches sent from this city for three or four days preceding Saturday taken possession of. If my friend from Vermont or any member of the Senate sent any dispatches during that period, which is highly probable, they are now in the possession of the managers. What for? To assail us or some of us; to make good the imputation that the impeachment has failed by means of corrupt and improper influences.

The honorable member from Massachusetts tells us that he is ready to go before the managers and tell all that he knows. What does he know? Anything that does not bear upon some Senator? They want it for that purpose. They suppose he has some information which will affect some individual members of the body; and he is willing to go and tell all that he does know. We have no right to restrain him. I invoke him to go, and then we shall have his testimony; and when it shall be made public, it will appear that he is examined with regard to certain individual Senators.

Mr. President, I am the oldest member of the body I believe, if not in point of service, in point of age. Its honor is as dear to me as the Government itself. I seek, as I have always sought, to vindicate it; and never while I have a voice to protest against it will I consent to place that honor in the keeping of the other branch, and particularly at this time, in relation to this impeachment. We are able to defend ourselves, to purge from our midst any member who may be corrupt. We may pardon prejudice, dark and destructive of the intellect, prejudice which can see no innocence and nothing but guilt, or prejudice that can see no guilt and nothing but innocence. That may be; but I trust in God, as I believe that there is not in the body on either side a man who can be corrupted, and that the intimation that such is the fact contained in the resolution to which I have referred, is, whether designed or not, a clear and palpable insult to the body.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have just a word to say, not particularly in reply to the Senator from Maryland; but I wish to say a word in the hope of bringing the Senate to some action.

Mr. POMEROY and others. Let us vote.

Mr. HOWE. That is what I want to get, a vote. I think it is very evident, as the Senator from Maryland says, that somebody has been whispering to the House of Representatives that improper means were used by which there were nineteen who voted against impeachment the other day; and it is very evident that somebody has been suggesting to the Senator from Kentucky that some means have been used, and are being used, to prevent more than nineteen from voting in the same way. My deliberate conviction is, Mr. President, that we cannot hush any of those whisperings by good speeches. I do not believe we can put an end to any of these rumors or allegations, silence them in any way, by stopping investigation. I do not believe the honor of the Senate, or the honor of any man in the Senate, is to be helped a particle by standing in the way of the freest and fullest investigation that either House has an appetite for. One of these committees is asked for in the Senate. I want to see it granted. It is said another committee is at work in the House. I do not know about that, except I know the House has sent here for some testimony. I wish the Senate would give the Senator from Kentucky the committee that he asks for; and then I wish the Senate would give the House the evidence it asks for; and I reserve my speech on the question of guilt or innocence, if ever I make one, until that time when I have the evidence before me.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I do not see any reason to change the views which I took of this question the other day. This debate has arisen upon remarks made by the honorable Senator from Missouri on his request to be permitted to make a personal explanation, a privileged question. I understood the Senator to say that he considered the request made of him in the nature of an insult from the House of Representatives to the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; the resolution adopted by the House.

Mr. YATES. Then I misunderstood the Senator. I should not have risen, however, but for the purpose of replying to a suggestion of the honorable Senator from Maryland, who expressed the hope that the Senate would adopt some resolution by which Senators should not be permitted to go before the managers to be examined as to what they might know upon this subject of attempted bribery or corruption. I take a different view of it entirely. I think that the Senator from Missouri is over sensitive in this matter. I think that he, above all others, should be willing to give the benefit of any knowledge which he may have upon this subject to the managers. This is a great trial; the parties are high; the accused stands high; the interests involved are great; the time at which the issue is made is important. It is proper that the trial should be conducted upon fair principles. There should be no attempt to smother investigation from any quarter.

The knowledge of the Senator from Missouri may, in the estimation of the managers, be of exceeding great importance, not that they would suspect that gentleman of being capable of yielding to a bribe. His integrity is unquestioned at home and here. His character is entirely too high for suspicion. No man can for a moment suppose that he has ever soiled his hands with money to influence his vote. But at the same time the knowledge which he may have may, in the estimation of the managers, be of the highest importance in the decision of this case. For instance, he may have been approached. It is not intimated that he has yielded to seduction in this respect. I think that communication to him was most courteous; it was circumspectly so on the part of the managers, respecting his feelings, respecting his position. But, sir, it may turn out that offers were made to him, for it seems that in these days of political corruption even the highest may be approached for political ends and purposes.

Now, sir, shall we establish a rule that a Senator who may possess important information which is to decide this case is not to impart that information to the managers or to the House of Representatives who are prosecuting the impeachment? As I stated the other day, the House of Representatives are proper parties to this proceeding. They are the prosecutors. It is not only their privilege and right, but it is their duty, if they have information, as they say they have in their resolution, which justifies them in believing that money has been corruptly used to bribe Senators to cast their votes contrary to what they might otherwise have done, to investigate the facts. Are we to surround the Senate with a Chinese wall and say that Senators shall not communicate for the benefit of the public any knowledge which they may possess? I think, sir, notwithstanding the high character of the Senator from Maryland, this Senate could not commit an act which would so degrade it, which would commit it to imperishable infamy as to pass a resolution saying that a Senator who might possess information important to the decision of this case should be relieved from communicating that information.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, with his permission.

Mr. YATES. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. It is whether the managers of the House of Representatives believe that the Senator from Missouri possesses such knowledge as he now describes?

Mr. YATES. Of course, I cannot answer.

Mr. FOWLER. And whether that is the object of the House of Representatives?

Mr. YATES. I will state, in reply to the Senator from Tennessee, that I suppose they think so; they say they do. They so state in their communication to the Senator from Missouri. They say to him that they believe his testimony is very important; that he is in possession of information which is important to the proper decision of this case.

I might object to the resolution which is offered by the Senator from Kentucky upon same ground that the Senators object to the resolution which was passed by the House of Representatives. It was objected by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I believe, the other day, and perhaps this morning, that that resolution reflected upon the Senate in the fact that it charged that corrupt means had been used to influence Senators. So I might say in reply, that the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky is a reflection upon the House of Representatives. It says that the House of Representatives, through its managers, by intimidation and threats, is attempting to influence the decision of the Senate in this impeachment trial. Could anything be more insulting than that? Could anything cast a more serious reflection upon a deliberative body than is cast by this resolution, declaring that the House of Representatives, through its managers, by intimidation and threats, is attempting to influence the decision of the Senate in this case?
